"LIZA ANN"

CONCLUDED FROM PRECEDING PAGE

gaze riveted on things beyond, she beheld the glories of eternity, she smiled again and again:

"Oh that beautiful home! that shinin' home! that blessed home! We air all one thar!"

Poor, storm-tossed soul! There had been for her no beautiful home in this world, nothing but helpless ignorance, hard work and poverty. But all that had vanished.

One who had come up out of great tribulation and had washed her robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb was beholding the mansion prepared for her.

A little after midnight she fell asleep in Jesus. The lines traced by years of care faded, and an expression of perfect peace took their place.

Following the custom of the mountaineers, we spent the remainder of the night in song. As the faint light of morning crept through the small window, one man stretched himself and said:

"I bet they hed a lively time ter Hinkers last night. His wife died yistidday, an' all the Hinkers come over. Ther powerful good at singin' an' I 'low they hed a lively time."

The mountaineers bury their dead as soon as possible after death, and all that was earthly of 'Liza Ann was to be laid at rest early that afternoon. As the light grew stronger, we saw that the rain was softly falling, and chilling everything it touched. A cold wind blew the moisture indoors, and we shivered as we sat around the breakfast table, eating the meal of corn pone, salt pork and black coffee.

For years 'Liza Ann had been saving a blue calico "to be laid out in," and long ago she had chosen a spot on the mountain-side, above the house, for her grave.
Though still early in the morning, the cabin was soon filled to overflowing with newcomers for the funeral; some standing around gossiping, and some sewing on the blue gown. From the front of the house came the sound of hammer and saw, as the men constructed the coffin of boards and covered it with black cambric.
On the hillside other neighbors were digging the grave. After the clothes had been finished and admired by friends,
Bet Mosley said in a decided tone:

"I ain't never made it no rule ter dress the corpse afore I ate, an' so I'll wait till atter dinner ter finish."

In the corner around the stove, women were preparing "drap dumplin's," chicken, corn pone and coffee, for there must be a dinner at every funeral, or people will say the mourners are stingy. The room seemed too small for all it must contain.
One woman sat on the boards, holding the poor, forsaken, earthly tabernacle of 'Liza Ann. Once we all had to vacate the cabin while the men took from the rafters a board with which to finish the coffin.

After dinner, all was made ready for the photographer. One of the most cherished possessions of these mountain folk is a photograph of the departed as they lie in the coffin ready for burial.
'Liza Ann wore her blue calico, plainly made, white cotton gloves, and a black hood. Often the personal belongings are laid in the coffin, but in this instance these were omitted.

After the likeness was taken, we followed the coffin up the steep hillside.
Cold rain, driven by a sharp wind, lashed our faces. The mountain peaks frowned in the gathering gloom, and mists gathered in the valley below. The rope with which to lower the coffin had been forgotten, and a mountaineer, in mud-splashed cow-hide boots, was dispatched to rob two mules of their bridle-reins to answer in its place.

The earth filled the grave to the accompaniment of wails of anguish, and I moved from one mourner to another, trying to comfort them. After the last words had been said and the last loving touches had been given to the mound, we descended the hill and made our way to our separate homes, with me going the words, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

THANKSGIVING*

National Blessings Involving National Responsibility and the Sleepless Vigilance of Christian Citizens

MUCH easier is it for us to offer thanksgiving to God, than it was for the people to whom the prophet addressed his words. The little nation, with Assyria on one side and Egypt on the other, led a harassed life. Proud, intolerant, impatient of foreign control, the people were in constant danger of the calamity which eventually came upon them of being torn from their loved land and carried into exile. With the prescience of far-seeing statesmen, Isaiah and his brethren saw the inevitable downfall approaching, and vainly strove to introduce the moral and religious reforms which might have averted it. Jehovah loved his people, they declared, and he was able to protect them, but why should he do so, when they disregarded his law and led selfish, luxurious lives? Isaiah, Amos, Hosea, plainly told the people of their sins, and warned them that if they persisted in them, Jehovah would bring judgment upon them. As we should say in these days, their habits were ruining the nation and undermining its strength. But a period of probation was granted them. Isaiah urges them to take advantage of it. He paints the character of Jehovah in glowing colors, warning them that he would forgive them and take them under his protecting care, but they would only turn to him and obey his law. Their state would not only be preserved, but would become the greatest in the earth and the leader among all the nations.

We are apt to think of the history of Israel as of something quite remote from the land of these utterances of the prophets, matters pertinent to their nation and its circumstances of the time, but of no concern to us. Yet the picture they draw of the Divine government is true and clear. It is the same Being now that he was in those days. We have good reason for thanksgiving, but we have also good reason to remember the dangers that beset a nation enjoying "fulness of bread and abundance of idleness." Our huge cities, the unprecedented volume of trade, the vast increase of our population and our national wealth, are matters we have ought to rejoice in at our national thanksgiving and we ought to make them the subject of thankfulness to God. But we ought, at the same time, to consider whether our lives show our consciousness of the responsibility that such prosperity entails. If we are heedless of that responsibility, if we disregard God's law and live as if our prosperity was the work of our own hands, to be used for selfish purposes, God will surely punish us as a nation, in some way, as he did his ancient people. Our responsibility is all the greater because of our being a self-governing people. No chronicler can say of us as the historians of Israel said, that the king caused the nation to sin. In every community, in every State and in the nation at large, the popular will is supreme. If in any community unrighteousness prevails and wickedness is dominant, it is because the people desire to do so. There are few communities in which if the Christian people held together they would not have the deciding vote in the elections and could compel the righteousness.

We have no occasion to glorify God, as Isaiah did, for "making of a city a heap of a defenced city a ruin." Our lot is not in happier times, and we have no enemies whose downfall would arouse national rejoicing. But we have enemies in our own ranks of whose machinations we should take heed. A right spirit of thanksgiving includes an appreciation of the blessings and a determination that in the future they shall not be impaired. The effort now being made in many sections to secularize the Lord's Day is an instance in point. Our Thanksgiving includes the remembrance of that day, and the ancient prophets attributed the fall of Israel in part to disregard of it. If we are thankful, as we ought to be, for the weekly day of rest from secular pursuits, we ought to be the more careful that the next generation shall enjoy the same privilege, and to that end we should strenuously resist every attempt to make it a day of amusement and social entertainment. The condition of the working people in France and other European nations, in which the Lord's Day is not observed, ought to be a warning to us. Our Thanksgiving includes also gratitude for the sanctity of family life, and this, too, is menaced by the lax divorce laws of certain States, which might be repealed if the Christian citizens insisted upon it. By all means let our Thanksgiving Day be a day of national rejoicing, a day of unalloyed gratitude for the blessings which God has showered upon us; but let our joy be that of sober, intelligent men, who love our country too well to allow the enemies of God to undermine its piety and its purity.

The Man who Made Modern Japan

To write the Marquis Ito's biography, says Frederick Palmer in Scribner's for November, is to write the history of the country since the revolution. To read the constitution is to read him, for he draughted it. Whether out of office or in office, he has been the great dominating influence for the last twenty years. He has been as frequently the power behind the premier as the premier. Out of office or in office he has always had the ear of the Emperor. His first cabinet was from 1886 to 1889; his second, 1892-1896; his third, January to June, 1897; his fourth, October, 1900, to May, 1901. The wonder of what he has accomplished is a part with the wonder that an edict should make the lords of provinces give up their fiefs and samurai, cut their queues, lay aside their swords, and face, with the masses, the problem of earning a living, when handicapped by soft hands and minds trained only to chivalrous etiquette. The modern Japan which his policy has brought forth was made possible by the religious devotion of nobles and coolies to the Emperor, which made the imperial wishes law; by the intense patriotism and the official integrity of the retainers of the Daimios, who have become the officers of the army and navy and members of the civil service. As an Occidental, I should place integrity as the first cause. When you have official servants so proud that even the postmen will not accept a Christmas present, a statesman knows that, whatever his errors of construction may be, the timbers are sound. As long as men become policemen on less than a coolie's pay for the honor of serving the Government, it will never lack for first-rate ability to fill its offices.

Reopening Pharaoh's Mines

A cable despatch states that Mr. C. J. Alford, a British mining engineer, has discovered several very ancient gold mines in Egypt, supposed to be those of the Pharaohs, which furnished gold to the temples before the Israelitish exodus. Mr. Alford says: "The country, which once possessed a gold supply sufficient for the whole world, is still rich, not only in gold, but in turquoise, emerald, lead, silver, beryl, porphyry and marbles."

JAMIESON, FAUSSET & BROWN'S BIBLE COMMENTARY

By Robert Jamieson, D.D., St. Paul's, Glasgow; Rev. A. R. Fausset, A.M., St. Cuthbert's, York, and David Brown, D.D., Professor of Theology, Aberdeen.

A complete commentary, critical, explanatory and practical, on the Old and New Testaments, 1380 pages, bound in cloth. Former Price, $7.50. The body of the work consists of notes that are concise, learned, free from verbiage and easily understood, that elucidate and explain difficult passages of Scripture, or whose import is not readily apprehended. Far in advance of the older works now in use, it is also the most practical, suggestive and scientific.

Rev. H. Clay Trumbull, Editor of the Sunday School Times: "I do not know of its equal, within its scope and cost."

Rev. J. H. Vincent, Bishop M. E. Church: "It deserves a place on the table of every Bible student."

These Questions will be Answered Dec. 18

1. What three kings were denounced in the Old Testament in the same words and threatened with the same fate?

2. When, where and how did the custom of publicly burning mortgages or notes on churches originate? Is it of American or foreign origin?

3. Does God repent? If not, how are we to understand such passages as Gen. 6:6; Jer. 42:19, where he is said to do so?

4. Is it better for the average young man to leave home to "see the world" or to remain steadily at home, except for occasional periods of limited travel, which do not break off his home connection?

5. Would it tend to decrease the number of divorces if all clergymen would agree not to solemnize a marriage when either of the parties had a divorced partner still living?

Questions of the Week

1. What is the significance of the frequent use of the number 40 in the Bible, and in what particular instances is the number made prominent?

While the superstition regarding the number forty may have arisen from its Scriptural use, it is supposed that it is not merely an arbitrary period, for a hint at the explanation of its origin lies in the fact that forty days approximate to a division of the early lunar year by the mystic number nine. Some of its prominent Scriptural uses are: Moses was forty days on the mount (Ex. 24:18, etc.); Elijah, strengthened by angel food, fasted for forty days (I. Kings 19:8); the rain of the flood fell for forty days (Gen. 7:12); Noah opened the window of the ark after forty days (Gen. 8:6); the spies spent forty days in searching Canaan (Num. 13:25); Moses twice fasted and prayed for forty days (Deu. 9:18-25); Ezekiel bore the iniquities of Judah forty days (Eze. 4:6); Nineveh was allowed forty days to repent (Jonah 3:4); the Israelites wandered forty years in the wilderness (Num. 34:33); Goliath defied Saul's army for forty days (I. Sam. 17:16); forty days was the period of embalming (Gen. 50:3); the Lord fasted for forty days (Matt. 4:2, etc.); the arisen Lord was seen for forty days (Acts 1:3); the Jews were forbidden to inflict more than forty stripes (Deu. 25:3). It is noteworthy that Jerusalem was destroyed forty years after Christ's ascension, and tradition says Jesus was forty hours in the tomb. Lent lasts for forty days, as does also quarantine. St. Swithin betokens forty days' rain, while the ancient laws concerning physicians, knights, husbands, wives, widows, sanctuary privileges, fines, etc., all cluster about this number.

PHILIP F. SCHNEIDER.

Its significance is maturity or completeness. It generally symbolizes temptation as in the case of Christ in the wilderness; a solemn experience as in the sojourn of Moses in the mount; chastisement as in the wanderings of the Israelites in the desert; an interval before destruction as in Jonah's warning to Nineveh. It must not be understood as a definite figure but as a round number implying a long period. Its use in II. Sam. 13:18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

2. What is the origin of the phrase, "Freedom of the city," and what is its present significance?

It dates back to the ancient Greek and Roman communities, where the citizens could, by vote, elect strangers to citizenship, later, when the rulers became supreme, they assumed this right. A burgess, or citizen, has ever been one who held some particular privilege in a municipal corporation. From this ancient custom it has come that magistrates throughout the United Kingdom, but more especially in Scotland, may confer the privilege of citizenship upon a person, by election of the magistrates of the burg, the burgesses taking a peculiar oath on election. The same privilege may be acquired in England, and from this comes our term, "Freedom of the city." It is now considered a mark of distinguished favor in many parts of the world, when cities are receiving visits from notable persons, either natives or foreigners, to confer upon them by election of the magistrates the privileges of citizenship. Their names are entered in a burgess list or register of municipal electors, but they are not entitled, when not resident or not carrying on business in that particular town, to exercise the municipal franchise or be inducted to the town council. Gen. Grant was elected to this privilege in London, Liverpool and Edinburgh during his tour of foreign countries.

the walls of Rome, as follows: All the gold and silver in the city; all the rich and precious movables; all the slaves who would prove their title to the name of barbarians. Louis IX. of France being taken captive by Almodin, son of Melecasa, offered one million besants in gold for the ransom of himself and his fellow-prisoners. The Brahmins begged of Mahmud to accept a ransom of ten million pounds sterling for their god, who was taken by the enemy.

4. What was Irving's basis for the Rip Van Winkle story, and where is its counterpart to be found?

It was from the German superstition of Emperor Frederick der Rothbart and the Kypphauser Mountain, Irving drew his "Rip Van Winkle." The tradition lived from the fourteenth century until the eighteenth, before it was printed, at Bremen, as Otmar's "Volks-sagen." The story tells of the sleeping Emperor Frederick, upon his ivory throne in a subterranean castle, with his head bowed upon a marble table, through which his long beard had grown. At the end of each century he awakens and asks, "Do the ravens still fly on the mountain?" and at the answer, "Yes," resumes his long sleep. His chosen knights dwell with him. A pair of lovers visited the castle, were feasted, and joyfully sent home with presents, to find they had been absent two hundred years. The second visitor (and counterpart of Rip) a goat-herd, Peter Klaus, was tending his flock, when a young man si-had the significance of one who dies to test or witnesses with his blood. To constancy martyrdom for any cause, the victim must be conscious of occupying a place which, at least, is open to the opposition of those who desire to remove him from that position. One must not be an unconscious martyr, but only a victim. The well-known dangers attending the high office of President of the United States, when agents of avowed anarchy abroad in all lands, constitute the late lamented President a martyr to the principle of orderly government. The words he spoke protect his assailant from enraged blows, the law might be kept in its supremacy, and him to have possessed the proper spirit of devotion for a martyr to lawful order.

C. P.

A martyr is a witness—a witness for God, for truth and righteousness—one tried by action and suffering, and found faithful by his conscience and to Christ through evil trial. Such, at least, are those who, by grace of God, are entitled to the name Christian martyrs. "Unto you it is given," says Paul to the Philippians, "in the belief of Christ, not only to believe on him, but to suffer for his sake." Not every sufferer, however, can be considered a martyr, though he may be a Christian, for it is possible that even Christians may suffer for their own faults, and not for righteousness' sake (see I. Cor. 11:30); but he who is persecuted and made to suffer for conscience's sake, cause he refuses to compromise his principle of right, though it would, without doubt, prove to him a temporal gain, is as assured a martyr for the cause of truth and righteousness as he who gives his body to be burned. The thought would not occur in the mind of a true Christian man as to whether by doing so and so he would be considered a martyr, but his first thought would be whether he would exalt or abase his Saviour by doing this thing, and by deciding in favor of the right, and being willing to suffer persecution if need be, he unconsciously becomes a martyr. By usage, however, the title which belongs to faithful Christians in general, has come modern times to be restricted to those who suffer unto death.

3. Outside of sacred Scripture, what were the most striking instances in history of individuals being held for ransom?

King Richard I of England, on his way back from a Crusade to the Holy Land, was taken prisoner by the Emperor of Austria and held for ransom for £100,000. Twenty shillings was assessed on every knight's fee, and the clergy subscribed liberally to raise the sum. David Bruce, of Scotland, was ransomed for 100,000 marks. After the battles of St. Quintin and Gravelines, in the war between France and Spain, the ransoms due by French prisoners to the Prince of Orange and the superior commanders were estimated at two million crowns; the Duc de Longueville paid Count Horn 80,000 crowns as his ransom. King John of France, who, at the battle of Poitiers, was captured by the Black Prince, was compelled to pay £500,000 in instalments. It was during King John's imprisonment that the name "brigands" originated, being first applied to mercenaries who held Paris in the king's absence, and who made themselves notorious for their ill-behavior.

FRED. L. SAWYER.

Darius offered ten thousands talents for the ransom of his mother and his queen, and he agreed to give Alexander his daughter Statira in marriage, with all the Asiatic provinces to the westward of the Euphrates for her portion. lently beckoned him to follow, and they went into a deep dell, where twelve knights were playing at skittles. Peter Klaus, seeing a can of wine, drank from it, and was overpowered with sleep. When awaking, found himself alone, and rubbing his eyes, looked about him to find, instead of his goats, new trees. Descending the mountain, he found the village altered, most of the people strangers, and his few acquaintances much older. Upon inquiry, he hears he has been away twenty years. The background of Irving's story was furnished from his intimate knowledge of the Catskill Mountains, his wanderings through Sleepy Hollow, noting the habits and customs of the villagers, and conversing with its sages and wise men. Diedrich Knickerbocker, whom he makes the author of the legend, was taken from life.

5. What is the true definition of "martyr"? Does martyrdom imply conscious and voluntary suffering for a principle, and the positive rejection of an alternative which would avert that suffering, or can one become a martyr unconsciously?

The true definition of "martyr," is "one who dies as a witness to a principle or element of his doctrine or faith." The word is from a Greek word, through the Latin into English without being changed. It is from an old Sanskrit root, which means to remember. In the Greek, the word means a witness, but as the most frequent testimony in the early Church was by death, the word has ever since

Miscellaneous Questions

Subscriber, Manor, N. W. P. 1. How many Christians are there in the world? 2. Is the number of Christians increasing as fast as the increase of population?

1. The number of Christians in the world is estimated at 501,600,000, which includes 240,000,000 Roman Catholics, and 261,600,000 of the Greek Church. 2. If, as statisticians estimate, the population of the world is 1,544,500,000, the proportion of Christians is about one-third of the whole. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, the population of the world was estimated at 437,000,000, and the number of Christians at 200,000,000, or 45 per cent. of the whole. The figures would imply that Christianity, in spite of the fact that it has more than doubled the number of adherents during the century, has lost ground relatively; but the figures are doubtless inaccurate. In 1800, statisticians had no idea of the population of Africa, and but a vague idea of that of a large part of Asia. During the past ten years, owing to the harvest reaped from the seed sown by the early foreign missionaries, the rate of increase has been very large, and this may be expected to continue, but it is doubtful if even yet keeps pace with the increase of population.

TO RAISE THE MCKINLEY ARCH

The National Memorial Arch Association Organized in Washington, and Now at Work

It is sometimes said that we Americans laud our heroes to the skies one day, and forget them the next. Yet, in the main, the great men of American history have always been remembered and enduringly honored. There are to be found in almost every State of the Union monuments of more or less importance which have been reared to the memory of some of our illustrious citizens.

There is at this time a movement on foot which, when carried to a successful termination, will stand through the ages as a refutation of the charge that America forgets the services of her distinguished sons.

This is the William McKinley National Memorial Arch Association, which has for its object the erection of a fitting memorial to the late martyred President. Just after Mr. McKinley's funeral there was a great deal of talk about a proposed memorial to his memory. His home town of Canton immediately took steps to put the project into execution, but it was felt that there should also be a memorial which would be more national in its character. For this reason, a committee of leading citizens of the District of Columbia organized the William McKinley National Memorial Arch Association, for the purpose of building a great National Memorial at the Capital, which would be commensurate with the dignity of the nation and befitting the life work of the distinguished President it was to honor.

The project was taken up cordially by the most prominent men in both official and private circles. President Roosevelt at once gave it his hearty support. Mr. Henry McFarland, the Commissioner of the District, who was a warm personal friend of President McKinley, accepted the appointment at the head of the Association, and inaugurated aggressive measures in starting the movement. He called a meeting of the Board of Trade of Washington, at which Mr. Gage, the Secretary of the Treasury, agreed to act as treasurer of the organization. Mr. Thomas F. Walsh, the multi-millionaire mine owner of Colorado, became its permanent secretary, and Mr. Charles J. Bell, of Washington, was made the chairman of the executive committee. It was decided to invite President Roosevelt and the members of several clerks, Mr. Buckley is prosecuting the work of the Association and attending to the immense correspondence which now entails upon it. Commissioner McFarland has received many letters from the Governors of the States, extending thanks for the honor of being chosen as Vice-Presidents, and expressing their willingness to co-operate heartily with the committee.

Among others who have been named national Vice-Presidents are Chief Justice Fuller, of the Supreme Court; Bishop Anderson, of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Mr. J. E. Browne, Commander-in-Chief Union Veteran Legion; E. R. Campbell, Commander-in-Chief Sons of Veterans U. S. A.; John Lee Carroll, President-General Sons of the Revolution; Francis E. Clark, President United Societies of Christian Endeavor; Thomas J. Conaty, Rector Catholic University of America; R. Drydenforth, Commander-in-Chief Union Veterans' Union; Charles W. Eliot, President Harvard University; James Gibbons, Cardinal Roman Catholic Church; John B. Gordon, Commander-in-Chief United Confederate Veterans' Association; William R. Harper, President University of Chicago; Emil G. Hirsch, Rabbi Sinai Congregation; W. H. Hubbell, Commander-in-Chief Spanish War Veterans; David Starr Jordan, President Stanford University; F. L. Patton, President Princeton University; Henry Codman Potter, Bishop Episcopal Church; John M. Schofield, Commander-in-Chief Military Order Loyal Legion, and Eli Torrance, Commander-in-Chief Grand Army of the Republic.

In addition to these, it was decided to give the CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER, FIRST V. P.

HON. HENRY MCFARLAND, PRESIDENT

HON. LYMAN C. GAGE, TREASURER

OFFICERS OF THE MCKINLEY MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION

of his Cabinet to become honorary members of the Association. The Governors of the various States and Territories, the members of the Supreme Court, and a large number of prominent men and women in private life were invited to serve as national Vice-Presidents. Permanent Washington headquarters were then secured in the Kellogg Building on F street. Mr. Barry Buckley, a gentleman who has had a wide experience in undertakings of a similar nature, was made assistant secretary and placed in charge of the office. With the as-women of the country representation in the Association. Miss Helen Gould was made the first woman national Vice-President; Mrs. Charles W. Fairbanks, President-General of the Daughters of the American Revolution; Mrs. Daniel Lothrop, President-General of the Children of the American Revolution; Mrs. Hearst, of California, and Mrs. Sternberg, wife of the Surgeon-General of the Army, were also appointed in this capacity.

Miss Helen Gould wrote at once saying that she was very much pleased to be appointed, that she was in the fullest sympathy with the object of the Association and should take pleasure in giving it her support. Mrs. Fairbanks and Mrs. Lothrop pledged the assistance of the Daughters and Children of the American Revolution. Other ladies will soon be identified with the work, and there is no doubt that the women of the country will do their share and more toward the erection of the arch.

A dozen or more committees have begun active operations toward raising the money for the Memorial. General Miles has charge of the Army Committee, and Admiral Dewey that of the Navy. Both of these gentlemen are giving the matter personal supervision, and expect to raise a large sum in the form of contributions among the soldiers and sailors.

Rev. Dr. Talmage, chairman of the Committee on Churches, with his accustomed vigor, addressed letters to many of his colleagues, and placed in the hands of the executive committee the names and addresses of more than one hundred thousand ministers of the different denominations. Hon. John W. Foster, as the head of the Committee on Foreign Subscriptions, has appointed an American Vice-President in all of the foreign cities where Americans are residing. Mr. Mitchell Dryden has charge of the Committee on Fraternal Organizations, and will appeal to every fraternal society in the United States. The labor organizations are represented by Mr. Gompers, and the patriotic ones by Mr. J. W. Douglas. The school children and the students at the universities and colleges will be given an opportunity to give by Doctor W. T. Harris, the Commissioner of Education at Washington.

Every contributor to the fund, from the smallest to the greatest, is to receive a handsomely-engraved receipt, which may be preserved as a memento of the Memorial. These certificates of receipt have been designed by Superintendent Meredith of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. They are beautifully executed, and will doubtless be cherished in many thousands of American homes through the coming years, as souvenirs of the nation's grateful testimonial to the sterling, statesman-like qualities of "the good President."

The form which the Memorial should take was discussed for some time before a conclusion could be reached. Mausoleums, sarcophagi, monuments and arches were discussed, but without result. It was last suggested that, as President McKinley had shown an earnest interest in the plan to erect a memorial bridge over the Potomac River leading to Arlington, the memorial to his memory should be an arch approaching to this bridge. This plan met with universal approval, and was adopted. As yet the design for the Memorial has not been called for, but it is understood that it will be by far the most magnificent archway this continent, and may, perhaps, be something of the style of the Napoleon arch at the Barriere Neuilly, in Paris.

This famous Paris arch cost more than $2,000,000, but it is believed that with the $1,500,000, which the Association expects to raise for the McKinley arch, fine a one as that can now be built at Washington. It is anticipated that it will require two years to raise the money and build the Memorial. When finished it will be a work of which the whole country will be proud, and which will do justice to the memory of the martyr-President.

CHAMPIONS OF THE INDIAN

The Service Rendered by the Lake Mohonk Conference to the Indian Wards of the Nation

By...
W. C.
DENNIS

LAKE MOHONK FROM THE NORTH END

THE PICTURESQUE ROAD TO SKY-TOP

TIME was when the name of Indian was one of terror and hatred. Then came the time when it was one of shame. Terribly has the white man avenged the sufferings mental and physical that the red man caused his forefathers. The wrongs the Indians have suffered at our hands are a blot that can never be effaced from our fair fame as a nation. But at least we may hope that an era of justice has now set in, and that no more such wrongs can be perpetrated in future. The conscience of the nation has been aroused, and such outrages as those which occurred so lately as a quarter of a century ago would no longer be permitted. No small part of the credit for this better condition of our relations with the red man is due to the Conference which meets annually at Lake Mohonk, N. Y. That Conference has voiced the rights of the Indian, and has exposed the plots of the unscrupulous men who have robbed him of his lands and his supplies. Not wilfully has our Government wronged the red man, but it has been deceived and duped by men who sought their own advantage at his expense. His protests, even when they reached Washington, were unheeded, and he was often silent under injuries through pride or despair. Now, however, through his friends who assemble at Lake Mohonk, his situation is better understood, and he has an influential voice raised against his spoliation.

Mohonk is a mountain 1,200 feet high, crowned by a lake eighty feet deep, which, in turn, is rimmed around by cliffs which culminate in the bold summit of Sky-Top, 300 feet above the lake. The mountain is part of the knife blade range called the Shawangunks, in Ulster County, N. Y. Mohonk is the Indian name for Lake of the Sky, and Shawangunk is the way to spell Shongum. The Mohonk House, romantically located at the north end of the lake, is the home of the Indian Conference. Every year since 1883, Hon. Albert K. Smiley has invited a large number of prominent men and women, in and out of public life, who were interested in the Indian question, to meet in conference at his mountain home as his personal guests. The college president, the missionary, and the politician, meet and exchange views with perfect freedom, and go away with a better understanding of each other and of the Indian. Out of this friction of ideas some important conclusions are always evolved which are embodied in the platform adopted at the close of each meeting. The Conference has thus come to be one of the most important influences in shaping the policy of the Government on Indian affairs. Since the Spanish War the Conference has devoted a portion of its time to the consideration of the condition of the inhabitants of our new possessions.

The Conference this year, which occurred on Oct. 16, 17, 18, was full of interest. Among those in attendance were: Dr. Lyman Abbott, Dr. Cuyler, Mr. D. W. McWilliams, of Brooklyn; Dr. Frissell, of Hampton; Captain Pratt, of Carlisle; Indian Commissioner Jones, Hon. W. D. Foulke, the new member of the Civil Service Commission, Congressman Sherman, Chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs, and nearly all the members of the board of Indian Commissioners, an unpaid body with co-ordinate authority with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The great object for which the Conference has always worked has been the placing of the Indian on terms of perfect equality with the white man as an American citizen, and then allowing him to work his own salvation. This policy recognizes that the Indian as a race is doomed; it seeks to save him as an individual. For years the policy of the Government was just the contrary of this. We herded the Indian on reservations; we made treaties with the tribes as with foreign nations; we denied him American law and American citizenship. Now all is changed. We make no more treaties with Indians; federal law is partially extended to the reservations, and last and best, under the provisions of the Dawes bill, the President has the power to allot the tribal lands in severalty, and each allottee becomes an American citizen. When the allotment is complete and the trust funds held by the Government paid over, the Indian question will have disappeared. Allotment is made at the discretion of the President, and so liberally has the power been exercised, that, in the opinion of many, it has proceeded too rapidly. Citizenship, many believe, has been thrust on the Indian, as on the negro, before he was ready for it. But the situation on the whole is distinctly hopeful, and the Conference is able to declare in its latest platform: "The nineteenth annual session of the Lake Mohonk Indian Conference congratulates the country on gratifying evidence of healthy progress and important results attendant upon efforts that have been put forth in recent years for the education and elevation of the Indian races. These are seen in a federal school system providing for the education of upwards of 25,000 Indian children, and the allotment of over 6,500,000 acres of land to over 55,000 Indians with a secure individual title; and in the possession of these Indians of all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizenship. We note with special satisfaction the action of the Department of the Interior since our last meeting, in issuing regulations for licensing and solemnizing marriages of Indians and preventing polygamous marriages."

Notwithstanding all that has been done, there is much still to do. At present the spoils system is perhaps the greatest obstacle to the disappearance of the agency, and to the successful management of the agency when it still exists. The appointment of agents has been farmed out among the Senators from the States in which the agencies exist. The platform contains a strong appeal to President Roosevelt to put a stop to this abuse. There is the more hope of the appealing successful, because Mr. Roosevelt attended the Conference in 1892, and thoroughly understands the Indian situation.

Another very important question that I can only outline in such an article as this, is the question of ways and means of Indian education. We have to ask ourselves whether the unit of effort should be the tribe, the family, or the individual; should the school be taken to the Indian, or the Indian taken away from his home surroundings and brought to the school? Almost admit that the Indian can be best approached (speaking purely from an educational standpoint) from his religious side. Again, the Indian who has no moral atmosphere at home needs a different education from the white man who has. He needs to have this atmosphere furnished in the school. But we do not believe in this country anything that looks like a union of church and State, hence the efficiency of our Government schools in supplying this needed religious environment is diminishing. All the contract denominational schools have given up Government aid except Hampton.

There is great need for more religious training. How shall we give it? Some say, with Captain Pratt, that there should be no such thing as a non-religious government school. Some say the only remedy lies in greater activity on the part of the churches. The Conference adopted the following conservative declaration: "This Conference puts itself on record as believing in schools both in Indian neighborhoods and at a distance from them; the proportion to be maintained between the two must be left to be arranged from time to time by experience. The eventual result to be reached is the abolition of all distinctively Indian schools and the incorporation of the Indian pupils in the schools of the country." . . . The Christian religion is the basis of Christian civilization, and the new opportunities opened before the American people, and the new responsibilities laid upon them, demand the co-operation of Christian churches in an endeavor to inculcate its principles and impart the spirit of the Gospel of Christ.

A Mission of Flowers and Fruit

The Work of a Band of Christian Women in the Hospitals and Homes of the Sick Poor BEAR ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." The practical working out of this divine precept is the inspiration of "The Flower and Fruit Mission," connected with Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, West 104th Street. The Rev. Louis Albert Banks, pastor, with the Rev. Charles Howland Cookman, as assistant minister, endorse this agency for doing Christ's work. The object of the Mission is to receive contributions of food, groceries, clothing, medicine, offerings of flowers and fruit, and distribute them in the homes of sickness and poverty, or in hospitals and homes for aged people. Mrs. L. J. is Superintendent of the work, aided by her assistants Mr. Smith, M. Walker and Mrs. Wm. Rhodes. Mrs. Areson is Chairman of the "Mercy and Help" Department, aided by Miss Townsend, of the W. C. T. U. Department. These leaders meet every Tuesday morning in the Vestry of Grace M. E. Church to receive the gifts. The generous responses from long hearts to the appeal from The Flower and Fruit Mission have enabled the workers to distribute thousands of bouquets of flowers, besides fresh fruit, clothing and necessary supplies. All these things have gone to homes of sickness and poverty, where God has said to some loved one "Come apart and rest awhile"—a card with a printed text of Scripture is tied upon each bouquet of flowers, which will bear a message of love and cheer to the "Shut-in."

start out on their mission of love, each carrying a large basket of flowers and fruit. In the hospital wards many eyes brighten as these workers go from bed to bed leaving fragrant gifts to greet the invalids. One of these ministering women writes: "We have seen the gates of opportunity open at our very feet this summer and autumn, and we stand amazed. It is easy to see how a simple bunch of flowers, put in the hand of some sick one, gives the opportunity to speak a word for Jesus, and by the sympathetic touch to win a soul."

A very touching scene is recorded of a dying woman, who said, as the flowers were laid on her bed: "Please put one on my breast until I have passed away." Within an hour she died.

A young mother, wasted to a skeleton by consumption, was visited. Her baby, seven weeks old, lay in the next room to her, pale and weak, with but little life left in its frail body. She had sent for these Christian women, who prayed with her and pointed her to Christ. In a few days she was greatly changed, and her face was like a sunbeam. She had accepted Jesus, and felt willing to die.

The next night her gentle spirit had obtained release. These are but a few of many similar scenes brought to the attention of these ministering women. Their beneficent work is not confined to Grace Church alone, but reaches out to the needy and neglected of the whole community.

The Flower Mission will gladly receive any gifts intended for the sick, and the donors will have the satisfaction of knowing that they bring sunshine into weary hearts and homes. Such aids to the work of the Mission will be gladly acknowledged by Mrs. Low, Grace M. E. Church, West One Hundred and Fourth street, New York City.

FAMINE-SWEPT SHENSI

Nearly One Third of the Population Dead, the Officials Estimate — "The Christian Herald" Relief Welcomed

DR. M. B. DUNCAN, the missionary who carried to the starving people of Shensi the relief contributed through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has sent the following letter, which will be read with deep interest by all who have aided the relief movement:

H'SIAN, SHENSI, Sept. 6.

Dear Friends: You will be pleased to have a letter to show how we got on when we came here. I need not go into the particulars of the journey from T'ai-yuan, further than to say that all along the way we were received as the guests of the Government and well treated. We stayed in kung-kuans almost every place, and, with one exception, were well received. We bought our own horses in T'ai-yuan, and we had drivers, pullers and escort detailed at every stage by the officials, as we came along. The usual number of the procession was made up as follows: First, the five cavalymen from T'ai-yuan, who accompanied us all the way and treated us splendidly, even when we arrived in H'sian-fu; then there were twenty-four drivers, eight for each chair; five pullers, four for each; and men sent to accompany us in each h'sien, and always four more foot soldiers, besides a few cavalymen usually sent from the various camps along the route. Thus our troops numbered in all usually from seventy—a rather imposing following.

There was a regular furor before our arrival, as it was reported that the foreigners were coming with a large following of foreign soldiers. After it became known that we only numbered three, and that our escort was Chinese, the fears were allayed. On entering Shensi, we were much concerned as to the reception it awaited us, but our fears were speedily dismissed when, on our arrival at the T'ur-Kuan Pass, the whole of the officials turned out to meet us. The Tao-Tai was particularly frank, and as he was the private secretary of Yung Lu for some considerable time, we took heart again that the previous record in Shensi would be maintained in Shensi. Nor were we disappointed, for all the five days to H'sian from the Pass, we were well received, and the officials seemed even more cordial than those east of the river.

On reaching H'sian, we were met by a runner sent by the two H'sian officials to conduct us to the house prepared for us near the Fut'ai yamen. Immediately we arrived, the district magistrates came to call, and we began the round of return visits that continued till yesterday, when we finished off with the officials of the Wai Wu-Pu—the new foreign office—Wang-Wen-Shao and Chu-Hung-Chi. The seven highest officials, from the would prevent it if they could, and that they dread the domination of foreign influence.

The facts regarding the famine are hard to determine with accuracy. The testimony of these officials, who even wish to minimize its horrors, is that at least thirty per cent. of the population throughout the province has perished. Official relief was stopped at the end of the sixth moon (middle of August), but the distress continues, and will persist till the autumn harvest has been gathered. The prospects are fair. Even the abundance of an autumn crop will not end the distress, for many are now living on grain borrowed on the growing crop, which many will have consumed before it be gathered. The work of relief with the funds of the American CHRISTIAN HERALD scheme has now begun.

In H'sian City alone, according to reliable investigations, there are some 50,000 destitute, including those in the Government refuges, who are now without means of support, since the official relief has been stopped. The Governor has kindly offered every assistance, and at present the Tam T'ai, who had the charge of Government relief, is now working in co-operation with Dr. Smith and Mr. Duncan in organizing relief. Within a few days, some 60,000 taels will be transformed into bread. The method adopted is as follows: The lists of the needy are revised, and then relief given to cases verified by those deputed both by the Government and by the foreigners. The relief has been both timely and beneficial. In order to secure promptness in the distribution, the Governor promised to make up any deficiency, should the funds be insufficient to place in the hands of all the poorest a sum of not less than $1.00 at once. Some do not like the idea of the foreigners being the dispensers of charity, but the starving poor have no such scruples. It is significant of the direness of the need that the Governor has been allowed, by edict of this day (Sept. 6) to extend the limit for the purchase of degrees at reduced rates for another year, that funds may be raised to help.

A MISSIONARY TRAVELING IN A CHAIR CARRIED BY CHINESE COOLIES

Governor downwards, invited us to a feast. It was a semi-foreign spread, in that the tables were placed together and covered with a white cloth, but the food was Chinese, only of the first and sumptuous kind.

The present Governor of H'sian has been to Russia and Berlin, so he has been compelled to outgrow the ordinary Tartar limitations.

There cannot be any question but that all officials of any worth are exceedingly anxious that the Court return to Peking. It is equally clear that the reactionists

"Which hope"

HERE is an Atlantic ocean of depth and fullness in the verse from which my text is taken, and I only wade into the wave at the beach, and take two words. We all have favorite words expressive of delight or abhorrence—words that easily find their way from brain to lip; words that have in them mornings and midnights, laughter and tears, thunderbolts and dew-drops. In all the lexicons and vocabularies there are few words that have for me the attractions of the last word of my text, "Which hope."

There have in the course of our life been many angels of God that have looked over our shoulders, or met us on the road, or chanted the darkness away, or lifted the curtains of the great future, or pulled us back from the precipices, or rolled down upon us the rapturous music of the heavens, but there is one of these angels who has done so much for us, that we wish throughout all time and all eternity to celebrate it—the Angel of Hope. St. Paul makes it the centre of a group of three, saying: "Now abideth faith, hope, charity," and though he says that charity is the greatest of the three, he does not take one plume from the wing, or one ray of lustre from the brow, or one aurora from the cheek, or one melody from the voice of the angel of my text: "Which hope."

That was a great night for our world when in a Bethlehem caravansary the Infant Royal was born, and that will be a great night in the darkness of your soul when Christian hope is born. There will be chanting in the skies, and a star pointing to the Nativity. I will not bother you with the husk of a definition and tell you what hope is. When we sit down hungry at a table, we do not want an analytical discourse as to what bread is. Hand it on; pass it round; give us a slice of it. John speaks of hope as a "pure hope." Peter calls it a "lively hope." Paul styles it a "good hope," a "sure hope," a "rejoicing hope." All up and down the Bible it is spoken of as an anchor, as a harbor, as a helmet, as a door.

Unlimited Supplies

When we draw a check on a bank we must have reference to the amount of money we have deposited, but hope makes a draft on a bank in which for her benefit all heaven has been deposited. Hope! May it light up every dungeon, stand by every sick bed, lend a helping hand to every orphanage, loosen every chain, caress every forlorn soul, and turn the unpictured room of the almshouse into the vestibule of heaven. How suggestive that mythology declares that when all other deities fled the earth the goddess Hope remained.

It was hope that revived John Knox, when on shipboard, near the coast of Scotland, he was fearfully ill, and he was requested to look shoreward and asked if he knew the village near the coast, and he answered, "I know it well, for I see the steeple of that place where God first opened my mouth in public to his glory, and I am fully persuaded how weak that ever I now appear I shall not depart this life till my tongue shall glorify his holy name in the same place." His hope was rewarded, and for twenty-five more years he preached. That is the hope which sustained Mr. Morrell, of Norwich, when departing this life at twenty-four years of age he declared, "I should like to understand the secrets of eternity before to-morrow morning." That was the kind of hope that the corporal had in the battle, when, after several standard-bearers had fallen, he seized the flag and turned to a lieutenant-colonel and said, "If I fall, tell my dear wife that I die with a good hope in Christ, and that I am glad to give my life for my country." That was the good hope that Doctor Goodwin had in his last hour, when he said, "Ah, is this death? How have I dreaded as an enemy this smiling friend?"

Philip de Morney, Prime Minister of Henry IV., when asked in his last hours whether he was certain of eternal felicity, replied, "I am as confident of it from the incontestability of the spirit of God as ever I was of any mathematical truth from all the demonstrations of Euclid." That was the hope that cheered Vara, the converted native of the island of Aimeo, when he said in his last moment, "The canoe is on the sea: sails are spread; she is ready for the gale. I have a good pilot to guide me, and a good haven to receive me."

No better medicine did a man ever take than hope. It is a stimulant, a febrifuge, a tonic, a catholicon. Thousands of people, long ago departed this life, would have been living to-day but for the reason they let hope slip their grasp. I have known people to live on hope after one lung was gone and disease had seemed to lay hold of every nerve and muscle and artery and bone.

Alexander the Great, starting for the wars in Persia, divided his property among the Macedonians. He gave a village to one, a port to another, a field to another, and all his estate to his friends. Then Perdicas asked: "What have you kept for yourself?" He answered triumphantly: "Hope." And whatever else you and I give away, we must keep for ourselves hope—all comforting, all-cheering hope. In the heart of every man, woman and child that hears or reads this sermon may God implant this principle right now.

Many have full assurance that all is right with the soul—they are as sure of heaven as if they had passed the pearly panels of the gate, as though they were already seated in the temple of God unrolling the libretto of the heavenly chorister. I congratulate all such; I wish I had it, too—full assurance—but with me it is hope. "Which hope." Sinful, it expects forgiveness. Troubled, it expects relief. Bereft, it expects reunion. Clear down, it expects wings to lift. Shipwrecked, it expects lifeboat. Bankrupt, it expects eternal riches. A prodigal, it expects the wide-open door of the father's farm-house. It does not wear itself out by looking backward.

It Always Looks Forward

What is the use of giving so much time to the rehearsal of the past? Your mistakes are not corrected by a review. Your losses cannot, by brooding over them, be turned into gains. It is the future that has the most for us, and hope cheers us on. We have all committed blunders, but does the calling of the roll of them make them any the less blunders? Look ahead in all matters of usefulness. However much you may have accomplished for God and the world's betterment, your greatest usefulness is to come. "No," says some one, "my health is gone." "No," says some one, "my money is gone." "No," says some one, "the most of my years are gone, and therefore my usefulness." Why, you talk like an infidel. Do you suppose that all your capacity to do good is fenced in by this life? Are you going to be a lounge and a do-nothing after you have quit this world? It is my business to tell you that your faculties are to be enlarged and intensified and your qualifications for usefulness multiplied ten-fold, a hundred-fold, a thousand-fold.

Is your health gone? Then that is a sign that you are to enjoy a celestial health compared with which the most jocund and hilarious vitality of earth is invalidism. Are your fortunes spent? Remember, you are to be kings and queens unto God; and how much more wealth you will have when you reign forever and ever! I want to see you when you get your heavenly work-dress on. This little bit of a speck of a world we call the earth is only the place where we get ready to work. We are only journeymen here, but will be master-workmen there. Heaven will have no loafers hanging around. The Book says of the inhabitants: "They rest not day nor night." Why rest when they work without fatigue? Why seek a pillow when there is no night there? I want to see you after the pedestrianism of earth has been exchanged for power of flight, and velocities infinite, and enterprises inter-stellar, inter-world.

I suspect that the telescope of that observatory brings in sight constellations that may comprise ruined worlds which need looking after, and need help saintly and missionary. There may be worlds that, like ours, have sinned and need to be rescued, perhaps saved by our Christ, or by some plan that God has thought out for other worlds as wise, as potent, as lovely as the atonement is for our world. The laziness which has cursed us in this world will not gain the land of eternal activities—so much tonic in the air, so much inspiration in the society, so much achievement after we get the shackles of the flesh forever off. Do not dwell so much on opportunities past, but put your emphasis on opportunities to come. Do not count the battles lost, but scour your musket for victories to come.

New Powers and Opportunities

Am I not right in saying that eternity can do more for us than can time? What will we not be able to do when our powers of locomotion shall be quickened into the immortal spirit's speed? Why should a bird have a swiftness of wing when it is of no importance how long it shall take to make its aerial way from forest to forest, and we, who have so much more important errand in the world, get on so slowly? The roebuck outruns us; the hounds are quicker in the chase, but wait until God lets us loose from all limitations and hindrances. Then we will fairly begin. The starting post will be the tombstone. Leaving the world will be graduation day before the chief work of our mental and spiritual career. Hope sees the doors opening, the victor's foot in stirrup for the mounting. The day breaks—first flush of the horizon. The mission of hope will be an everlasting mission, as much of it in the heaven hereafter as in the earthly now. Shall we have all as soon as we enter realms celestial—nothing to learn, no other heights to climb, no new anthems to raise, a monotony of existence, the same thing over again for endless years? No! More progress that world than we ever made in this. Hope will on the hills of heaven and look for ever-bright landscapes, other transfigurations of color, new gorges rolling over the scene, new celebrations of victory, other worlds, heaven rising into grander heavens of glass mingled with fire, becoming a more brilliant glass mingling with a more flaming fire. "Which hope?"

Lost Ones Restored

Now let me introduce this feeling into the lives of some who are at times hopeless. There is a father whose son has gone wrong. Father and mother about given him up, he seems so headlong, so unmanageable, so dissipated, and the old folks do not know how to carry on. He has ceased to be a son, but they hear of him through people who carry bad news, and every time the report is deplorable. He swears, he gambles, he drinks, he is into all the shambles of sin. His former employer there is no hope for him, and all outside the family agree in thinking he will never reform. The father and mother have not quite given him up, and these words are to strengthen their hope. That boy is going to be a man. You have a hold on him that you must not let go. Through prayer you may win the eternal God for the side of the struggle. You must enlist all the heavenly dominions, cherubim, and seraphim, and archangels in the movement to save your son. Some day or night he will call a halt to his infamous practices. Something will happen to him, as happened in a New York hotel to a son of one of the most distinguished clergymen of Scotland and one of the Queen's chaplains. "When can I see you?" said a distinguished local young man at the close of one of my services in Brooklyn Tabernacle. I said, "You can see me now." He said, "No; I want a private conversation with you at your own house. When can I come?" I said, "To-morrow night." "Your name," I asked. He gave me his name, the exact name of his father, whose name was known and is known through the Christian world, though long ago he departed this life. Returning home, I took a book of which his father was the author, and in the picture at the opening of the book I found that the young man had most markedly his father's features. So I was sure there was no deception.

Family Reunions

On the following evening he came. He said that was the black sheep of the family flock. He had wandered the world over, and been in all kinds of wickedness, but a few nights before, after reading a letter from his mother in Scotland, he had retired for sleep, but in the adjoining room he heard some young men in such horrible conversation he could not sleep. He was shocked, as he had never before been, by the talk of bad men. He arose, struck a light, took out the letter from his mother, and knelt down by his bedside and said: "O, Lord, God of my mother, have mercy on me!" He said that since that prayer he was entirely changed, and loved what he before hated, and hated what he before loved, and asked what I thought it all meant. I replied: "You have become a Christian." He said he might be called at any time to leave the city. He never saw him again, but it seemed to me that he had turned his back upon his wicked past and had started in the right direction. And it may be so with your young man. Write him often. Tell him how you are all thinking of him at home, and, it may be, your letter in hand may call upon his mother's God to help and save him. Hope! you of the gray hairs and wrinkles. Heaven has its thousands of souls who were once as thoroughly wrong as your boy is. They repented, and they are with the old folks in the healthy air of the eternal life where they have become young again. Hope on, though you may never hear of your son's reformation, and others may think he has left this life hopeless, who knows, but that in the last moment, after he has ceased to speak and before his soul launches away, your prayer may have been answered, and he be the first to meet you at the shining gate. The prodigal in the parable got home and sat down at the feast, while the elder brother, who never left the old place, stood pouting at the back door and did not go in at all.

To another class of persons I introduce the angel of hope, and they are the invalids. Perhaps after long watching, or overwork, or towering grief, your nervous system is ruined. Perhaps you have a hidden disorder that the world knows nothing about, and which you do

Leaders in the Movement for Helping and Training
the Men of To-morrow in Conference in Boston

STORIES of the work being done in various cities for the welfare of the boys of our country have appeared in this journal at different times. The work is one of the most useful and hopeful in the whole sphere of philanthropy, and is doing more than any other to advance our national interest in the next generation. A wise step was taken recently in bringing together the men who are the acknowledged leaders in the movement. The meeting was held in Boston, Mass., under the presidency of Rev. Edward Everett Hale, who has from the beginning taken a deep interest in the movement. The object was a comparison of the methods adopted for bringing the boys under good influence, and the discussion of details of the work. Our readers are already familiar with the plans which have been carried out by the workers in the Boys' Clubs, and these were fully described and endorsed at the meeting. All the reports showed that the work was appreciated by the boys, and that a marked improvement in their manners and their character had been observed wherever a Boys' Club had been established. Among the leaders present were Jacob Riis, author of The Children of the Poor; Rev. William H. Cutler of Detroit, Mich., whose work among boys has won for him the name of "The Boy's Pastor"; Mr. Thomas C. Clary, Superintendent of the famous Boys' Club, of Fall River; Prentiss A. Jordan, Superintendent of the Pittsfield, Mass., Boys' Club; George W. Hinckley, Founder and Superintendent of the great work for boys at Good Will Farm, East Fairfield, Maine; Mary E. McGie, President of the Brooklyn Public Library Association; Charles W. Birtwell, of the Boston Children's Aid Society; Henry F. Burt, head of Boys' Clubs in Chicago Commons; Hugh F. Fox, President of the New Jersey State Board of Children's Guardians; Erik S. Mason, of the Bunker Hill Boys' Club; Samuel V. Dike, Secretary of the National Society for the Protection of the Family. Mr. Jacob Riis was able to give the meeting the history of the Boys' Club of New York, the origin of which he describes so eloquently in his famous book. It was probably the first Boys' Club in America and it is now in possession of the finest building of its kind in the whole country. It is just completed, and with its furnishing cost about a quarter of a million dollars. Mr. Thomas Chew related the history of the Boys'

THE BOYS' CLUB AT FALL RIVER, MASS.

Club of Fall River, Mass., of which he is superintendent. The club, from a very small beginning, has grown to a membership of one thousand, and has a building, the gift of Mr. M. C. D. Borden, of New York, which cost $85,000.

The Good Will Club, for boys, in Hartford, Conn., was founded some years ago by Miss Mary Hall, and it is still under her supervision. It has a membership of more than 700, and its home is in the buildings once used as a school for girls by Catherine Beecher.

The Pittsfield (Mass.) Boys' Club, of which Mr. Prentiss A. Jordan is superintendent, has a membership of more than five hundred small and large boys, who find the pleasant rooms of the club a far better place than the street as a place in which to spend their evenings.

The Boys' Brotherhood of Philadelphia is an organization of which Dr. Edwin J. Houston is president, its object being to direct the physical, mental and moral development of boys and lead them to Christ. It has a brotherhood house, in which the boys find the very best of Christian influence.

The work of the George Junior Republic, for boys, at Freeville, N. Y., is too well known to need any detailed description here.

A very much older work of a somewhat similar kind is the Thompson's Island Farm School for Boys, in Boston Harbor. It teaches scientific farming, and it was founded nearly one hundred years ago, and its superintendent is Mr. Charles H. Bradley.

The story of Good Will Farm for poor boys, at Fairfield, Maine, has already been described in this journal. Mr. George W. Hinckley, the founder, was the originator of the Good Will Farm movement, and he is still superintendent of the work at Fairfield. Many hundreds of boys have been made better during the progress of the work, which, from a very small beginning, has developed into one of the most important organizations for boys in America. The work is not confined to boys alone, for there is a cottage for girls, and another one is being built.

Some of these institutions were founded for the reclamation of boys who had already gone astray, but their chief glory is in the fact that, in providing a meeting place and wholesome amusement, they have given the boy's life a right impetus and direction before the evil influences of the street have gained a power over him. All honor to the men who are devoting their lives to this noble purpose. We sincerely hope that their recent meeting has given them encouragement in their self-sacrificing labors, and imparted new inspiration.

with any delicacy speak of. Perhaps it may be a rheumatism that distorts and inflames, or a neuralgia which runs its sharp knife along the temples of your forehead. Perhaps insomnia keeps you as wide awake at twelve o'clock at night as at twelve o'clock at day, and hour after hour, like one in the Bible times, cry: "Would God it were morning!"

Cannot take the diagnosis of your disorder, but let me cheer you with one of two thoughts. Such marvelous cures are being wrought in our day through medication and surgery that your invalidism may yet be cured. Persons as ill as you have got well. Cancer and tuberculosis will yet give way before some new discovery.

But if you will not take the hand of hope for earthly or alms, let me point you to the perfect body you are yet to have if you love and serve the Lord. Death is but a prolonged anæsthetic upon your present body, and you will never again feel an ache or pain, and in his good time you will have a resurrection body, of which we know nothing except that it will be painless and glorious beyond all present appreciation. It must be the health of that land, which never is cut of cold or blast of heat, and where there is no wind sowing pneumonias on the air, your fleetness greater than the foot of deer, your eyesight clearer than the sky—perfect health, in a country where all the inhabitants are everlastingly well! You who have in your body an encysted bullet ever since the Civil War! You who have kept alive only by precautions and self-reliance and perpetual watching of pulse and lung! You who are deafened ear and dim vision and the severe back-ache! You who have not been free from pain for ten years! How do you like this story of physical reconstruction, with all weakness and suffering subtracted and everything jocund and bounding added?

Do not have anything to do with the gloom that Harriet Martineau expressed in her dying words: "I have no reason to believe in another world. I have enough of life in one, and can see no good reason why Harriet Martineau should be perpetuated." Would you not rather have the Christian enthusiasm of Robert Allan, who, when some one said, "I will be satisfied if I manage somehow to get into heaven," replied, pointing to a sunken vessel that was being dragged up by a diver: "Would you like to be pulled into heaven by two tugs like that vessel yonder? I tell you I would like to go in with sails set and colors flying."

Let me introduce the element of hope to those of people who are in despair about the world's moral condition. They have gathered up appalling statistics. They tell of the number of divorces, but do not take into consideration that there are a thousand happy homes where there is one of marital discord. They tell you of the large number in our land who are living on the edge of lives, but forget to mention that there are millions of men and women who are doing the best they can. They tell you the number of drunkeries in this country, but fail to mention the thousands of glorious churches with two doors—one door open for all who will enter for pardon and consolation, and the other door opening into the heavens for the ascent of souls prepared for translation.

Those pessimists do not realize that two inventions of our times are going to make it possible under God to bring this whole world into salvable and millennial condition within a few weeks after those two inventions shall be turned into the service of God and righteousness, as they will be. I refer to the telegraph and the telephone. If you think that God allowed those two inventions to be made merely to get rapid information concerning the price of railroad stocks, or to call up a friend and make with him a business engagement, you have a very abbreviated idea of what can be done and will be done with those two instruments. The intelligence of the world is to be expanded, and civilization will overcome barbarism, and illiteracy will be extirpated, and the promise will be literally fulfilled—"A nation born in a day."

Let Hope say to the foreboding: "Do all you can with Bible and spelling book and philosophic apparatus, but toil with the sunlight in your faces, or your efforts will be a failure. The pallor in the sky is not another phase of the night, but the first sign of approaching day, which is as sure to come as to-night will be followed with to-morrow. Things are not going to ruin. The Lord's hosts are not going to be drowned in the Red Sea of trouble. Miriam's timbrel will play on the high banks "Israel Delivered." High hope for the home! High hope for the church! High hope for the world!"

I introduce the Angel of Hope to those who have through disease lost Christian friends. "How could I find them," says a bereft soul, "up there in the land of the multitudinous?" You may find them by inquiry, by heavenly escort, and by unfailing memory of the guard at the gate. "And he carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God, having the glory of God; and her light was like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal; and had a wall great and high, and had twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels." So you see there will be an angel guarding each gate. As you go in ask the armed guard. He saw your loved one pass through, and will know the direction to take, and by what fountain or in what street of gold is the mansion prepared. The blessed Christ knows where your departed loved one is, and he will tell you if no one else will. Fifty ways of finding out the whereabouts of your ascended one. "But will I surely know him when I get there, for he will be so changed?" Yes; for you will be just as much changed, and the old affinity will assert itself. The soul will be as easily distinguished by soul there as on earth the body is distinguished by the body.

Open that closed instrument of music in your parlor that has not been played on since the hand of the departed player forgot its cunning. Put up before you on the music board the notes of the hymn of Isaac Watts and sing "There is a Land of Pure Delight"; or James Montgomery's hymn, "Who Are These in Bright Array"; or Filmore Bennett's "Sweet Bye and Bye"; or "Jerusalem the Golden." Take some tune in the major key—"Ariel" or "Mount Pisgah." While you play and sing the Angel of Hope will stand by you and turn the leaves and join in the rapturous rendering. Reunion with the loved and lost! Everlasting reunion! No farewell at the door of any mansion! No good-bye at any of the twelve gates! No more dark apparel of mourning, but white robe of exaltation! Hope now is on its knees with face uplifted, but Hope there will be on tiptoe or beckoning you to follow, saying: "Come and hear the choirs sing! Come and see the procession march! Come and see the river of life roll! Come with me over the hills that rise into everlasting heights." Celestial Alps and Himalayas hoisted into other Alps and Himalayas!

From this hour cultivate hope. Do so by reading all the Scriptural promises of the world's coming Edenization, and doubt if you dare the veracity of the Almighty when he says he will make the desert roseate, and the leopard and kid will lie down in the same pasture field, and the lion, ceasing to be carnivorous, will become graminivorous, eating "straw like an ox;" and reptilian venom shall change into harmlessness, so that the "weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den, and there shall be nothing to hurt or destroy in all God's holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." So much for the world at large.

Then cultivate hope in regard to your own health, your own financial prosperity, your own longevity, by seeing how in other people God mercifully reverses things and brings to pass the unexpected, remembering that Washington lost more battles than he gained, but triumphed at the last. And, further, by making sure of your eternal safety through Christ Jesus, understand that you are on the way to palaces and thrones. This life a span long ending in durations of bliss that neither human nor archangelic faculties can measure or estimate—redolence of a springtime that never ends, and fountains tossing in the light of a sun that never sets. May God thrill us with anticipation of this immortal glee! "Which hope?"

I said in the opening of this subject that my text was only the wave on the beach, while the whole verse from which it is taken is an ocean. But the ocean tides are coming in, and the sea is getting so deep I must fall back, wading out as I waded in; for what mortal can stand before the mighty surges of the full tide of eternal gladness? "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

Our Relief Work in China

IN another part of this issue, we print two letters from Dr. Moir B. Duncan, a member of the Missionary Relief Committee, and the chosen agent of that committee to conduct THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund relief work in the province of Shensi. His reports are most encouraging, and show that the relief contributed by America arrived at a critical time, when the local and imperial relief funds were practically exhausted and thousands of the populace were facing death from starvation. He was gladly welcomed by officials and people, and every facility for effective distribution was placed at his disposal. At the time of sending his letter, the work of life-saving was already well under way, the food generously supplied by God's people in America reaching the hands of the famine-stricken people direct, and absolutely without being diverted or interfered with by Chinese officials.

It has been asserted in some quarters that the imperial government of China did little toward assuaging the sufferings of its subjects in the provinces afflicted by famine. Dr. Duncan shows this characterization of the Chinese to have been an unjust one. The imperial government in a little over a year had spent in Shensi alone, 120 wan of taels (about $900,000) and the provincial government 300 wan of taels (over $2,000,000), besides large sums contributed from other provinces, and from various sources.

Up to Sept. 14 fifty thousand famine sufferers in Shensi had been succored by Dr. Duncan and his assistants, from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. Later reports will doubtless show a much larger number rescued from starvation, through the same beneficent means. Divine blessing rests upon the work, and the prayers and sacrifices of our people at home are already finding a glorious answer.

The Divorce Question and the Protestant Episcopal Convention

THE recent Convention held by the Protestant Episcopal Church in San Francisco, Cal., must pass into history as one of the most important ecclesiastical gatherings of the new century. This, because of the personnel of the body, and as it embraced nearly all the most prominent bishops, clergy, and well-known laymen, and because of the grave and vital questions discussed and action taken by that august council.

Among the important questions brought before the body that aroused considerable debate was, whether the Church should refuse its sanction to the remarriage of persons who had been divorced. This was brought about by a new canon sent down from the "House of Bishops" to the "House of Deputies," and which reads as follows:

No minister shall solemnize a marriage between any two persons unless, nor until by inquiry, he shall have satisfied himself that neither person is the husband or the wife of any other person then living, or has been the husband or the wife of any other person then living unless the former marriage was annulled by a decree of some Civil Court of competent jurisdiction for cause existing before such former marriage.

Correlated with this subject the following resolution was submitted by the House of Bishops which reads:

Resolved, The House of Deputies concurring, that Title II., Canon 13, section 3, section 4, section 5 be repealed and in their place be inserted the following canon:

Of persons marrying after divorce. No person divorced for a cause arising after marriage and marrying again during the lifetime of the other party to the divorce, nor any person marrying a person so divorced, shall be admitted to baptism or confirmation or be permitted to receive the holy communion until the written approval of the Bishop shall be given; provided, that this prohibition shall not apply to the case of the innocent party to a divorce for cause of adultery; and provided, also, that the sacraments shall in no case be refused to a penitent person in imminent danger of death.

Heated debate and the most intense feeling instantly prevailed. Dr. Huntington, of New York, proposed an amendment as a way to compromise, "permitting the innocent party to remarry." This amendment was lost. Then the conflict was renewed over the prohibitive act. To all intents and purposes, had it passed, it would have virtually assumed the position of the Roman Catholic Church. The best minds of the Convention saw this, and with them it was greatly doubted whether such an enactment would have either a restraining effect, or reduction of the number of applications for divorce.

Beyond a doubt the Prohibitive act would have found great favor with the High Church or ritualistic party, whose sympathies are more with Roman Catholicism than the great body of Episcopalians. The attitude of the Convention, however, was most pronounced against any such legislation, and regarded it not only as unjust and oppressive, but unwarranted by the word of God.

It must be conceded by students of sociological questions that while such a canon might have reduced the number of applications for divorces, it never would increase marital felicity, but in all probability would greatly increase vice, and the scarlet crime which justifies divorce—viz., marital infidelity. After a long discussion as to what formal disposition should be made of the canon as a whole, a motion to refer it to a committee to report in 1904 was lost by a unanimous vote, and the whole was rejected with one divided, and no dissenting diocese. This present agitation for better marriage canons has failed, but it had far better fail to become a law of the church than that the church should be unmerciful and unlike Jesus Christ, the Great Head of the Church.

Bishop Clark, of Rhode Island, says:

I am not among the rigorous. I think we have no right to be wise above that which is written, and I think we do a great injustice and a grievous wrong to a large class of men and women who have married and raised families in perfectly good faith.

Bishop Graves, of Laramie, says:

My opinion is that the measure is altogether too strict.

Bishop Gibson, of Virginia, says:

I did not prefer the canon as passed, because I thought the canon which we had already was more in accordance with the Bible.

Bishop Kinsolving, of Texas, says:

I voted against this proposal coming from the House of Bishops, and would have been satisfied to leave the canon law of the Church as it is, and I think the measure proposed is a little too sweeping and drastic myself. I think a milder attitude and one providing for certain exceptions in cases to be considered might have accomplished a sufficiently good present purpose.

Bishop Randolph, of Virginia, says:

The old rule is based on the teachings of Christ, and has operated well.

Bishop Leonard, of Salt Lake, says:

I do not favor the proposition to forbid all remarriage. I stand on the old canon; the old canon suits me just as it stands. I do not think it is a good plan for us to try to go too fast. I am conservative on that proposition. I do not think I could define my position any better than that. The old canon is not all that I could want; but still it expresses my position very fully, better than anything that has been proposed. I am glad to see that the whole country is interested and is moving along that line; but I would rather the rest of the country should catch up with us than that we should go still further ahead of the other people. I would rather that they should try to come up to our level than that we should go so far beyond. And, of course, there are a large number of people who are not Christians at all, who are not going to be influenced particularly by what we say or think.

These conservative servants of Christ recognized the fact that many good people at present not communicants would be alienated from the Church, while others now within its pale would leave it, and multitudes would not be influenced at all by such drastic measures.

It still remains true that there is needed all over our land to-day an immediate reform and reconstruction of our divorce laws. Our present laws are a scandal, and a shame. In some States marriage and divorce stand in the proportion of one to ten, one divorce to every ten marriages. In the District of Columbia during the year 1899, there were a little over 3,000 licenses granted by the Supreme Court for marriage, and during the same year, 1,008 applications for divorce were filed in the courts of the District. Granted that only 100 were actually divorced, still there is the fearful revelation of nine-tenths seeking to be free who are leading lives of misery, bound to each other, where love has died out, if it ever existed!

The sturdy debate failed in San Francisco by a attempt to unite two extreme factions by a compromise utterly beneath the dignity of that body, and the Church of Christ; and never could have commanded respect of the great outside world. The debate, however, shall not have been in vain if it arouses an aggressive spirit in all our churches, and among our statesmen to secure a uniform law which shall apply to all the States alike, North, South, East and West, and which shall comport with the sacred Scriptures. This is to be the coming great campaign in the twentieth century, and unless there is some arrest speedily made of the deplorable and dangerous progress downward in regard to marriage and divorces in the United States, it will become a serious question if we ever celebrate the second centennial of the grandest Republic that ever rose in history! Immorality is the fatal rock on which all past ruined empires have sunk. "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." If the foundations be destroyed, what shall the righteous do?

Disabled Ministers

THE Church suffers where there is no adequate provision made for her ministers. Until sickness or old age overtakes them they are generally well cared for. They receive enough, by the exercise of a frugal economy, to feed and clothe themselves and their families. Usually, at the cost of commendable sacrifice, they give their children a good education. When, however, from whatever cause, the period of disability arrives, grave questions arise both as to the welfare of the church and the minister's support. It becomes apparent that for the average church and minister there should be a separation; and no one appreciates the situation as keenly as the minister himself; he would resign forthwith if he had a warrant for even a moderate support. A pitiable attempt is made by some Protestant denominations to meet this exigency, but the annuity is so meagre, that it seems to emphasize poverty and to humiliate the man. The Jewish and Roman Catholic Churches, wisely provide for a period. The practical question presses: "Should the Protestant Church put forth more effort to pension her disabled ministers?" Considering the ten years required for intellectual training, the large expenses incurred, and the small stipend received during the period of vigor, precluding the possibility of saving to any considerable amount, is it not reasonable and right that God's disabled and superannuated ministers should be pensioned, without being pauperized? Apart from the Christian aspect, this matter should receive the consideration of the humanitarian. It would be but a proper recognition of value received. For, it must be admitted, that in every community the minister stands for whatever is best, in law and order, in morals, in temperance, in education, in culture and public spirit. In these days of immense wealth, and when its possessors are seeking for various worthy channels through which to distribute it for the good of humanity, let the disabled ministers receive their due proportion of serious regard.

What to Wear in Church

A VERY thoughtful contingent of Christian women are much opposed to the plan of removing hats during church service. They think that women doing so liable to misunderstanding, and that they appear to pay little reverence to the place. Their feeling is founded on an ancient conception of propriety which ordered a woman to be covered in public, and especially in God's house to be clothed upon with modesty as with a garment. If any woman, sitting without her bonnet in church, should thereby feel herself uncomfortably conspicuous, the good of the hour would be impaired, and, equally, if she gave others discomfort by violating their ideal, she would not be quite blameless.

There is a suggestion of a new fashion in church bonnets, a very plain, small and quiet bit of head-gear, which would interfere with no one's sight of the minister, and concentrate no attention. There has not come a single voice of opposition. "Keep the big dressy hats for other occasions," writes one friend, "but adopt something simple for church." The best taste indicates that our church toilettes should be plain rather than showy, and that the rich should wear nothing ostentatious that the poor beholding, should stay away from the house of the Lord.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Prince's World Tour

NEWS comes from Berlin that the young Crown Prince, and heir-apparent to the German throne, Frederick William, will, in all probability, set out soon on a tour of the globe. In ancient times, foreign travel was the prerogative of bold and adventurous spirits alone, but in these days, and with our multiplied transportation facilities, by land and sea, a world-tour has become a recognized part of the education of those who aspire to a wide knowledge of human affairs. Transcontinental railroads and swift ocean liners, have made comparatively safe and pleasant at which less than half a century ago was a hazardous experience. Prince Frederick William, who is only sixteen, and the eldest of six sons, will profit greatly by his contact with the people of other lands, and will return to Germany broader in mind and far more erant in ideas than if he had never set foot beyond the confines of his future empire. He has, like his younger brothers, been carefully educated under the direct superintendence of his father, whose instructions to his sons' tutors were that the boys be trained to honor, truthfulness, patriotism, and especially in religion, besides learning the ordinary branches of education. The little nine-year-old child, Princess Victoria Louise, the only girl in the imperial family, is a great favorite with all, and especially with the quiet and thoughtful Prince Frederick. The Empire over which, the natural course of events the Prince will ultimately rule, is vitally concerned in the development of his character. Besides the direct power that will be vested in him, there will be the indirect influence which in a monarchical country an Emperor always necessarily exerts over his people for good or evil. It is still true as it was in ancient times:

For the transgression of a land many are the curses thereof; but by a man of understanding knowledge the state thereof shall be prolonged (Prov. 28: 21).

Employees Rewarded

Mr. Carnegie's latest step in the course he has adopted of distributing his wealth during his lifetime, instead of waiting to do it will at his death, is a graceful act of appreciation of the services of the men who helped him to gain it: Twenty-three employees of the Edgar Thompson Steel Works at Braddock, a plant of the Carnegie Company, have been rewarded for their faithful service by substantial gifts of bonds which will make them junior partners in the concern. The total amount distributed among them is understood to be about a million dollars. The rule governing each employee's portion was that he should receive bonds now yielding annually a sum equal to the salary paid to him, so that his income will be practically doubled. About one half of the beneficiaries received their bonds outright, and the others will receive the annual earnings of the bonds, which will stand in their names. This recognition of faithful service is an example that deserves to be tensively followed, and if the principle were generally adopted there would be fewer strikes and less hostility between capital and labor. It encourages the Christian to know that he, too, serves a Master who will surely reward him for his fidelity.

Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things (Matt. 25: 21).

Boyish Adventure

The attempt of six boys to reach the Buffalo Exposition in spite of their being without funds, has had a sad ending. Six boys, the oldest of whom was only eighteen, conceived the project of traveling from their homes in Brooklyn, N. Y., to Buffalo, recently. They had heard and read so much of the wonders of the Exposition that they could not rest until they had seen it. They set out on a freight train, in which they concealed themselves. They had previously practised jumping on and off moving trains in the Pennsylvania Railroad yard, and had acquired some proficiency in that dangerous practice. They succeeded in getting off the freight before they were discovered, and then set out on foot for a few miles. But they became hungry and were glad to turn a little money to buy food by the way. A farmer gave them a day's work and they bought some bread and drank some water from a brook by the roadside. They reached Sharon Springs safely, but there one of them fell ill. The others developed similar symptoms, and took the first opportunity of leaving their sick companion and returning home. There four of them became ill with typhoid fever. Two of them died, and two others are critically ill. It is supposed that the water they drank from the brook was contaminated. Doubtless they had foreseen many of the dangers of their adventure, but this was one that they would not be likely to expect. It is so with young men whom curiosity leads into paths of sinful pleasure. They too often drink draughts which poison their souls.

They whose judgment was not to drink of the cup have assuredly drunken; thou shalt not go unpunished, but thou shalt surely drink of it (Jer. 9: 12).

Death of Li Hung Chang

China's greatest statesman and her most enlightened ruler died on November 7. He was seventy-nine years of age, and had been one of the most conspicuous figures in Chinese affairs for half a century. He was little known outside his own country until the visit of General Grant to China in 1876. The American general conceived a deep respect for the Chinese statesman, and when he returned often spoke of him with expressions of high esteem. The Bismarck of China, Grant called him, and the title was deserved, though, as Li used to say after Bismarck's fall, the parallel did not hold good to the end, as he was still in power and authority. Li became prominent during the Taiping rebellion in 1853, in making peace on the best terms he could gain was, however, unappreciated by his government, and for a time he was under a cloud. But he was indispensable to the rehabilitation of the country and was soon reinstated in power. In 1896 he made a tour of the world, receiving everywhere the honors due to his genius. It will be remembered that in the recent famine he showed how fully, in contrast with most of his countrymen, he had kept himself acquainted with public events, by appealing for help to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which had done so much for India in a similar calamity. There were many and serious defects in his character, but at this time of bereavement the world will remember only the services he rendered to his country, which now sustains such a loss as led the Poet King of old to exclaim:

Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day! (II. Samuel 3: 38).

BRIEF NOTES

At this season, there are thousands of poor in New York City who will look for their Thanksgiving dinner to the generous readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who in past years have regularly helped us to set forth a bountiful Thanksgiving feast for the homeless ones at the Bowery Mission. We expect to do so again this year, and to supply a wholesome, substantial meal to the friendless waifs who gather at the Mission doors every Thanksgiving. Any contributions our friends may send us toward this special benevolence will be gratefully received, and acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Depressing reports of the condition of Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, the famous pastor and mission worker of London, are received.

A record contribution was made on October 27, by Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church, New York. In response to the appeals of Dr. E. S. Tipple, the congregation subscribed seventy thousand dollars at the three services, to clear the church of debt.

It is expected that the famous Baptist pulpit of Hanson Place Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., rendered vacant by the removal of Dr. A. C. Dixon to Boston, will be occupied by Dr. P. S. Henson, of Chicago, who is not only an eloquent preacher but an able expositor of prophecy.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie is reported to have made arrangements for another magnificent public benefaction. It is to be a great Polytechnic Institute to be located at Pittsburg, Pa. The building, appliances and endowment are expected to involve an expenditure of thirty-three million dollars.

Dr. J. Milton Greene has sailed for Cuba to take charge of the Presbyterian missions on that island. Accompanying him were Rev. A. Waldo Stephenson and Miss Mabel Bristow. Dr. Greene has already done valuable service in Porto Rico, and formerly in Mexico. His success among the Spanish-speaking races encourages the hope of a great work being done in Cuba.

Interesting meetings have been held at Louisville, Ky., by Mr. S. H. Hadley, of the Water Street Mission, New York. A man who was converted in Water street has started a Rescue Mission in Louisville, which is doing good work. Mr. Hadley's visit was made the occasion of special meetings, which were largely attended. At one of them eight men, who had been deeply moved by the Gospel message, made profession of conversion.

when he was nominally at the head of the army, which was really controlled and directed by General Gordon. Before that time, however, Li had earned distinction in the university of his country by passing the three great ordeals of examination and coming out at the head of fifteen thousand competitors. After the Taiping rebellion the government showered honors upon him, and he held the highest place in the Empire as viceroy of Chili. It was he who had the difficult task of negotiating the treaty of peace with Japan after the disastrous war which humiliated China. His wisdom

Our Orphan Waifs in India

Missionaries Testify to the Spiritual Results of the Benefactions of our Readers to Orphans of the Famine

CHEERING testimony to the value of work among orphan children comes from missionaries in India who received help from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund in supporting the orphans of the 1897 famine. As our readers will remember, various sums of money were received after the close of the Famine Fund, from Railroad Companies and other sources, which, with a small balance not distributed among famine sufferers, was applied to orphan work. A contribution was sent to Pundita Ramabai, sufficient to support for a year one hundred of the child widows she had rescued from starvation. The balance was divided among twenty-two missionaries, who had undertaken the support of orphans, in such proportions as would maintain the children assigned to the fund for three years.

It is gratifying to learn from these missionaries, who report in letters recently received, that the result of the three years' work has been eminently satisfactory. Many of the children proved so intelligent that they have become teachers and helpers in the missions; others who received industrial training are now able to earn their own livelihood by their trades; and of nearly if not quite all of them the highest hopes are entertained of their leading consistent Christian lives. It is the unanimous testimony of the missionaries that no work has ever yielded so much, in proportion to the money invested and the care bestowed. There is always an apprehension of the adult convert relapsing into heathenism; but these bright children, after their three years' training, are so thoroughly grounded in the faith of the Gospel, that the missionaries have unbounded confidence in their remaining faithful through their future lives. Such assurances are doubly welcome at this time, when the five thousand orphans of the famine of 1900 are beginning their training as the adopted children of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. The news that the mis-

Rev. E. S. Hume, of Bombay, writes, that the orphans of 1897, who were supported in his institution by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund, gave remarkable evidence of the genuineness of their conversion by the eagerness with which they helped in caring for the orphans of the later famine. "They helped in the bathing, feeding, and teaching of the newcomers, have nursed them when sick, have taught them to pray, helped them in committing passages of Scripture to memory, and in many other ways have shown that spirit of helpfulness which springs from a heart changed and renewed by divine power. The boys have organized a Christian Endeavor Society. Every Monday they meet for prayer and the development of plans of Christian usefulness. Their in the case of the younger ones who are still with us continue their help. I thank you most heartily, and a who through you have helped me to look after these children. I am sure they will be rewarded for what they did."

Among the letters recently received is one from Rev. Geo. N. Thomssen, the Baptist missionary of Bapatla. He writes from "the Hills," whither missionaries go for a brief vacation in order to get some relief from the intense heat. It has been found that the white man can endure a longer strain, if, every year, he goes to the Hills for a week or two for cooler air. During his visit Mr. Thomssen visited the Hill tribes called the Nilgiris, whom the Basle mission is trying to convert. They are without exception, the most degraded of all the inhabitants of India, but even among them the Gospel is gaining influence.

The pictures at the foot of the page were taken at Godhra, where there are a large number of orphans, 18

sionaries send of the beneficiaries of the fund of 1897 will bring joy and hope into many an American home, which now counts an orphan in India as a member of the family. God has abundantly blessed the work, as we felt sure he would, and that blessing encourages us to hope that the larger number now deriving their support from our readers, will, in like manner, become the children of the Kingdom.

Rev. Dennis Clancy, who is conducting the work at the Methodist Episcopal Mission at Allahabad, during the absence of his brother, Rev. Rockwell Clancy, writes: "It is amazing the progress the children whom your readers have supported, have made in the three years. I venture the assertion that few children in committees are numerous, each with its special duty. Some of their assignments are unique; but they are all inspired with the desire to render help where it is most needed."

Dr. R. A. Hume, of Ahmednagar, writes: "The money received from you went toward the support of eighteen boys and fifteen girls, who were admitted into our Orphanage during the famine of 1897. By the blessing of our Heavenly Father, every one of these thirty-three children is living and doing well in body, mind and soul. Six of the boys are preparing to be-of whom are being supported by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Rev. Robert Ward, who is in charge, did excellent service in the famine, and so efficient was his work, that the Government availed itself of the knowledge and experience he had gained. "You would not recognize Godhra Mission House now," he says, writing to Dr. Klopsch. "Since you were here we have made accommodation for 500 children, and are very busy getting the newcomers in order." Mr. Ward has a camel at his station, on which he makes preaching journeys to distant villages. He, like other missionaries, reports that since the famine, the people who were formerly opposed to Christianity now give the missionary a cordial welcome, and listen to his message

Occupations for Women—IX

Dressmaking and Millinery

THESE are time-honored occupations, and date back to great antiquity. Women must have pretty and serviceable gowns and headgear, and those who can furnish them with these are always sure of a good livelihood.

It would be a revelation to some women to enter a fashionable dressmaker's establishment in New York. There is no sign on the house, the door-plate may bear a family name, but it is precisely like that of any other household in the street, and carries no hint or suggestion of trade. One is shown into a elegantly appointed drawing-room, where, if a new customer, one waits with what patience one may, until the great lady is ready to receive her. A new customer, however, must usually have credentials of some sort, for the gowns and wraps made here are very costly, and, being ordered from the house, material, trimmings, making and all are not for the purses of those who must consider economy. Every summer, Madame goes to Paris or Vienna, and spends some weeks, and returns with new models, which represent the creative thought of Parisian and Austrian fashion-dictators. In the work-rooms, out of sight, there are the employees of the establishment; the fitter, who does nothing but fit; the operator on skirts, who sees only that the skirts turned out from the establishment are graceful and stylish; the girls, who do, each of them, a single part in the making of a dress. They are paid by the day or week, the fitter receiving a high salary, the skirt-maker equally well paid, the rest faring no better than, possibly not so well as they would, if they went out on their own.

Many dressmakers who carry on their profession at their own homes in a much less elaborate manner than this, earn an excellent income. They are always austere, and their fellow-women learn to treat them respectfully, and to wait with docility on their pleasure. I wish all women were conscientious about paying them immediately when they send their gowns home. It is related of a well-known evangelist from abroad that when preaching to an immense audience in an American city, he asked all who were under religious conviction to lift their heads, adding: "If there are these here who are in debt to their dressmakers and tailors they need not lift their heads"; the inference being that deep religious conviction and honesty must always accompany each other.

The dressmaker who works by the day in a family has always plenty of customers. When she arrives, the ladies of the household usually arrange to assist her, and the place becomes, for the time, a fortified camp, everything yielding to the fact that there is a dressmaker in the house, and that her time is very valuable. She cuts and fits and plans, and does the nicer and more complicated parts of the work, and the ladies work under her direction. Her average payment is anywhere from one to three dollars a day, with her meals, the rate of remuneration differing according to the quality and to her own deftness and style.

Millinery is less difficult to learn than dressmaking, but requires more native talent, more taste, knack and skill. A young woman in New York was left suddenly dependent on herself after a childhood of wealth and luxury. Her friends advised her to try journalism, teaching, or art. "I have no aptitude for these things," she said. "I will be a milliner." She apprenticed herself to a fashionable milliner, and devoted six months to learning the trade thoroughly. Then she took another course under a buyer, and learned how to shop, what to purchase, where to go, and how to manage her stock. When she opened her shop, her success was assured beforehand, and she speedily became an enviable independent business woman.

Two young ladies from the South observed, several years ago, that Northern girls had not so many dainty and charming toilettes made from thin fabrics, organdies, mulls, Swiss muslins and sheer wools, as they might have, garments suited rather to the individual than following one slavish style. So they opened a suite of rooms, and began making airy, pretty dresses for any lady to wear in summer, and they soon had no reason to fear the wolf at their door.

In any line, originality and daring count. The woman, who can strike out anywhere for herself, is sure

The Winter Wardrobe

ONLY the other day we were busy over our summer clothes, and here are the cold winds, and wet roads, and dark skies, which precede winter. We must look out now for a garb that will protect us from the piercing blasts, and enable us to meet the rigors of the coming season with indifference.

Where shall we begin? The person who thinks first of show and display, naturally considers her outside garments before she plans for underwear. The proper order is, however, to give most thought and attention to the clothing worn next the skin, and, if one must exercise rigid economy; let that be excellent, even if the external clothing is plain and coarse.

One finds it hard to impress this fact on the minds of those who regard dress as of supreme importance and who have little acquaintance with society. The cook and the housemaid often spend more in proportion to their means, on their gowns and hats, than does their employer, and I have often seen domestic servants very scantily supplied with night-dresses and stockings, when their best gown, worn proudly on their Sunday afternoon out, was of satin or silk.

In providing for children let this be the rule, good, well-fitting and comfortable under-clothing first, then whatever can be afforded for externals. For grown women, it is always a safe rule, to spend most on shoes and gloves, for a woman well-shod and neatly gloved may wear exceedingly plain apparel, and still make a presentable appearance.

If obliged to go out in all weathers, be careful to provide extra wraps, easily removable when entering a house. Women often take serious colds on leaving church, where they are apt to sit through a service with their "things" on, not taking off the close-fitting jacket that is hard to discard without assistance. Going out from a heated audience room, into icy air, they are an easy prey to cold, and cold may herald pneumonia or pleurisy.

The Ripened Leaves

The vivid moment in the gorgeous coloring of the autumnal woods, is when the leaves are ripe and a sudden sharp kiss of the frost has heightened their reds, yellows, purples and browns into regal splendor. Walking through the forests and under arching boughs in our rural villages is like a promenade under a series of magnificent garlands and bouquets. Then, comes some night, a wild wind, a last onslaught of the tempest, and the trees will stand in the statuesque beauty of bare boughs, looking skyward. But for every fallen leaf, there will be a bud unrolled next spring.

So Nervous

"But, I'm so nervous! I'm impatient with Lulu, but I can't help it. She is such a fractious child."

"Perhaps Lulu is fractious because her mother is nervous. Do you ever try hard for self-control? Only the mother who can rule her moods, her voice, her temper, can have equable and gentle children."

"When you feel as if you could fly out of your skin, for you can't keep still, and you don't know what's the matter, how are you to control yourself?"

"A good plan is to sit perfectly, absolutely, movelessly still, for a few moments. Don't speak, don't frown, don't give way to any twitching and gesticulating. Refuse to speak loudly, or to scold. Think whether you are not overworking. Half the nervous misery in the world is directly due to being overwrought and never really rested. Dare to be lazy and to let things go. Get into the sunshine. And do not storm at Lulu, poor child."

THE CALL OF MOSES

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DEC. 1.
EXODUS 3: 1-12

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT:
CERTAINLY I WILL BE WITH THEE. EXODUS 3: 12

MOSES' life is divided into three periods of forty years each:

1. His educational preparation for his life-work through training in his own home and in Pharaoh's college.
2. His meditation and secular preparation in God's "brush college" of the wilderness.
3. His manifold work as deliverer, teacher, and leader of his people.

The story before us comes in where he turns, at God's call, from eighty years of preparation to forty years of work.

The Lesson Story

Nothing is said in the Bible about the childhood of Moses beyond the time when, as a founding, he became the son of Pharaoh's daughter, with his own mother as his nurse. It is left to our imagination to picture him as a bright boy, day by day adding to his store of knowledge, until he became skilled in all the learning of the Egyptians. The next mention of him is the rash act of slaying a cruel Egyptian taskmaster who was maltreating a Hebrew workman. Living in the palace, as he did, we may be sure he would hear many bitter things said about his people, the Hebrews. The words would enter as steel into his soul, and help to develop the deliverer in him. This was a part of God's plan, but the time had not yet come for Moses to strike an effective blow on behalf of his people. Neither Moses nor his enslaved countrymen were yet ready for the Exodus, as his fruitless avenging of his countryman proved. (Acts 7: 23-29). The killing of the Egyptian having shown they were not ready for his leadership, Moses fled to the land of Midian, there to take up the life of a shepherd. He needed to have yet forty years more of schooling before God could use him as the deliverer of his chosen people. It is not enough that God calls us, we must let him qualify us, and for that, solitude, as well as study, is needed. The Bible tells us little about this period, only that he took up the cause of the shepherdesses against the rude shepherds who had been in the habit of driving away their sheep from the water which they had drawn from the deep well.

A class of boys in a London Board School were being examined orally in Scripture. One of their special subjects of Scriptural study for the year had been the life of Moses. "What would you say was the general character of Moses?" asked the inspector; "that is to say," added he, "what sort of man was Moses?" "He was meek," said one boy; "brave," answered another boy; "learned," added a third boy. "Please, sir, he was a gentleman," piped forth a pale-faced, bright-eyed, neatly-dressed lad of eleven or thereabouts. "Gentleman!" repeated the official, with a look of unmistakable surprise, "What do you mean?" The well-behaved little boy promptly replied in the same thin, nervous voice, "Please, sir, when the daughters of Jethro went to the well to draw water, the shepherds came and drove them away, and Moses helped the daughters of Jethro, and said to the shepherds, 'Ladies first, please, gentlemen.'" Through his gallantry in that case, Moses gained his noble wife, Zipporah, who was one of the shepherdesses, and who became the mother of his two sons, Gershom and Eliezer. There is no further record in the Bible of Moses' life during those forty years in Midian, except that he kept his father-in-law's flocks, but all of the while he was being prepared in the faithful discharge of plain duties for the greater work before him.

At last God's time was ripe, and suddenly the call came in a most startling manner. The Lord would reveal his glory to Moses, and so impress him with his high commission. God did not show his face to Moses, but he did show his shining glory, veiled by a bush that it might not be too dazzling to look upon. God might have called to Moses out of heaven and felled him to the ground, as he afterwards did Saul of Tarsus; but he chose rather to make his light a beacon by which Moses should be brought to his very side, where he could talk with him. Moses saw the light and thought it was a burning bush, but marveled that it was not consumed, and so proceeded to investigate it. What he thought was fire was the glory of God. How accustomed Moses grew to that light as it afterwards shone daily upon his pathway for forty years in the pillar of fire when he was leading God's people through the wilderness! When he came up to the bush, he heard the voice of God saying, "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the ground whereon thou standest is holy ground." It was "holy" because God was there. And having put off his shoes Moses, as it were, stood uncovered in the presence of a king, ready to receive his bidding. In deepest reverence Moses hid his face and bowed to the ground, not daring to look up. God laid before Moses his great plan for the deliverance of his people. In striking contrast with the former rashness of Moses was the humble reply; had God called him to be Israel's deliverer indeed? "Who am I that I should go unto Pharaoh and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt?" But he was reassured by God's promise to be with him, and by the four miracles which he was given power to do as signs that God had sent him, guarantees of his commission, namely: the turning of his shepherd's rod into a serpent, then back into a rod; the lep-rosy brought upon his hand, and the swift following cure. But learned as Moses was, he declared himself, in the usual modesty of greatness, unable to give God's message fittingly to Pharaoh. And again God reassured him by the promise that his brother Aaron should accompany him as spokesman.

Had Moses failed to go, had God
Granted his prayer, there would have been
For him no leadership to win—
No pillared fire, no magic rod,
No wonders in the land of Zin.

No smiting of the sea—no tears
Ecstatic, shed on Sinai's steep—
No Nebo with a God to keep His burial! Only forty years
Of desert watching with his sheep!

Illustration and Application

Five hundred years had passed since God called Abraham, the Washington of Israel, the father of his country, to lead a chosen family to the Land of Promise: and now he was to be succeeded by the Hebrew Lincoln, the emancipator, Moses.

It would be a most profitable study to compare the call of Moses with other divine calls to duty all through the Bible. Most like it are the calls of Isaiah (Chap. 6) and of Paul (Acts 9), both commissioned by God's own voice, the first named out of that same shekinah glory whose lambent flame played harmlessly in the branches of the bushes on Horeb, which did not picture Israel unconsumed in the flame of affliction, but God filling his people with grace and glory. (For martyr churches that defy the fires of persecution, the fiery furnace of Babylon, where persecuted saints walked unhurt with Christ, is a fitter symbol.) But Moses, Isaiah and Paul were all called to preach. More emphasis is needed on the fact that the "callings" include trades as well as professions. Men who despise their handiwork, or think of it as merely a means to win money, not as a ministry to God and man, to which they are called, need to hear anew the divine words about the call of Bezaleel, the mechanic, the later associate of Moses: "See, I have called by name Bezaleel, and I have filled him with the Spirit of God, in wisdom and in understanding, to work in gold and in silver and in brass and in cutting of stones and in carving of wood, to work in all manner of workmanship (Ex. 31: 2-5). A eler, standing outside Cologne Cathedral, expressed his admiration of its beauty. "Yes," said a laborer, who was near, "it is a fine building, and took us many a year to finish." "Took you?" exclaimed the tourist. "Why, what have you to do with it?" "I mixed the mortar, sir," was the modest yet proud reply. The laborer had a right to feel that he had a share in the grand work. By consecrated service anywhere, one helps in the work of building up human society into a holy temple in the Lord.

But to most of us God's calls to duty come through some other person—a mother, a pastor, or some modern seer or prophet in whom the Bible lives anew. Even Peter received his call through Andrew, his brother, whose example shame many of us (John 2). God's call to Pharaoh came not direct but through Moses, who was to him, with his mighty miracles, "the finger of God."

During a season of revival, a friend was praying one evening for a certain unconverted neighbor. After this manner he prayed: "O Lord, touch that man with thy finger; touch with thy finger, Lord!" The petition was repeated with great earnestness, when something said to him: "Thou art the finger of God! Hast thou ever touched this thy neighbor? Hast thou ever spoken a single word to him on the question of salvation? Go thou, and touch that man, and thy prayer shall be answered." It was voice from the throne. God's servant arose from his knees self-condemned. He had known the man as an impenitent for a quarter of a century, yet had uttered not a word of warning. Hundreds of opportunities had come and gone, but the supreme question of life had been set aside for such topics as the weather, the latest news, politics and trade.

First, God calls to salvation, saying, "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock. If that hath ears to hear let him hear. Then comes the call to save others: 'Let him that heareth say Come.' We should not forget that the words, 'The Spirit of the bride say Come,' mean the 'Spirit-filled Church says Come'—not the pulpit and the religious press alone, but the true Church in all its members, the lowliest little finger of God to touch some other so with a prompting to heed God's 'Come' and 'Go.'

Not often are men called miraculously like Moses and Isaiah and Paul. All the Apostles but one heard from Christ only quiet "Follow me."

Our Friend, our Brother and our Lord,
What may thy service be?
Nor name, nor form, nor ritual word,
But simply following thee.

Some will hear God's call only when it speaks to them out of the fires of bereavement or financial disaster or some other "fiery trial." And to those who love him even, he finds it necessary to speak often out of such fires. Mary of Bethany was mourning the death of her brother, Lazarus disappointed—perhaps displeased also—that Jesus had not come in response to the message, "He whom thou lovest is sick, nor yet when he was informed that Lazarus was dead. Four days later, when Jesus came, Martha promptly went forth to meet him, but Mary would not go at first. The came to her rebellious heart the message, 'The Master is come and calleth for thee.' To every sorrowing heart comes that message from one who can comfort in sorrow and who calls us to forget our own sorrow in comforting others and in carrying forward the good work of those who have died. When a soldier falls in the front rank, the comrade behind him does not retreat to mourn, but moves forward to fill his place in the firing line. Is your life lonely because of comrades fallen, or because you are "shut in," or shut out in some position where there are few boon companions? Think how lonely Moses must have been when he gave up Egypt's University and palace and busy marts for the pastures of Midian! Especially was it true, because he had already been called to be Israel's deliverer, and daily they were dying of oppression. So also was it with David, anointed king, yet a fugitive pursued, like a hunted deer, by Saul, through years whose trials were preparing him not only to rule Israel, but also to comfort the world with his psalms. Such lonely years Christ was called to spend in Nazareth and Paul in Arabia, after visions of the "Father's business" had called them to call the multitudes to God. Whether such lonely hours are given us to prepare to live or to prepare to die, to the Christian they are "lonely" only in moments of beclouded faith. One is not lonely who knows he is alone with God.

Lonely? Ah, no, not lonely,
While Jesus standeth near!
He comes within the tent door,
I feel his presence here.

A Scottish shepherd boy was wont in his night watches to measure the star distances in the sky by beads on a string. He called himself "God Almighty's scholar," and felt himself divinely taught, as he thus lived "near to Nature's heart." The world now knows him as James Ferguson, the great astronomer and inventor. So Moses was in God Almighty's school all those wilderness years, learning all about the country through which Israel was to be led, though this he knew not then.

To Feed the Bowery Waifs

MRS. BIRD'S PLEA FOR A THANKSGIVING SUPPER FOR HER TWO HUNDRED HOMELESS BOYS

OUR readers are already familiar with Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the "Mother of the Bowery Boys," and her noble rescue and soul-winning work among the young lads who drift to the Metropolis from all parts of the country. Her present plea in their behalf will be read with general interest:

MRS. SARAH J. BIRD

"Dear Friends: We have a meeting for young boys in the Bowery Mission every Wednesday night, which has proved a great success. Most of these boys are motherless as well as homeless, and they come to the great city to get work. They find it very hard to earn enough to keep them from starving, and some even eat the food from the ash barrels. Many become familiar with sin in its most degrading form, yielding to the temptations of the saloon and dance halls, and, after a few months, unless put under better conditions, they are apt to drift into the ranks of the criminals.

"Many of these same boys love to sit in the seats of the Bowery Mission and sing the Gospel songs. We know that many who frequent our Bowery Home are saved unto righteousness. The only hold we can have upon boys of this wild, restless class is by endearing them to us by kindness, and making them feel that they belong to our big family at the Mission.

There is no time in the whole year when we get so near to their hearts than at our Thanksgiving gatherings. Last year the generosity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers made it possible for us to give them a Thanksgiving supper, and it was a sight to see the two hundred hungry boys, seated at the long, attractive tables, with snow-white tablecloths, laden with good things, big fat turkeys, steaming vegetables, celery, cranberries and mince pies. It made no difference to them what dignitaries were on the platform, for their eyes were fixed on the turkeys. Those who served them were greatly amused at the table talk; one sober-faced fellow said to his "pal" by his side: "Say, Jim, them's genuine turkeys; no fake in this Bowery grub." Another, looking suspiciously at the green tops of the celery, said: "Bob, look at the red-headed fellow, he's eating them roots."

My attention was drawn to a sad, pale-faced boy, and I asked him where he lived. He replied: "Well, you see, I don't live nowhere, since I went to that excursion to Boston with my father and mother, and that day I lost them. That was a year ago, and they don't advertise me, and so they don't find me."

We notice a great improvement in the lives of these boys. I told them at our meeting last night that our numbers were increasing so rapidly, that I was getting a little anxious to know where we would get turkeys enough for our Thanksgiving supper, but added, "Perhaps some of you don't like turkey!" No one but those familiar with a Bowery audience could imagine the outburst of groans and "Oh my's!" which followed my suggestion. A suppressed answer came from some quarter suggesting "Christian Herald turkeys," and relief came at once, for they had taught me this lesson: To cast all my care upon the good, kind-hearted readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. So, dear friends, I leave the situation with you. If you would like to have a share in giving these homeless boys a Thanksgiving supper, money can be sent me through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

SARAH J. BIRD.

The Preacher Made Hay

And Won the Sceptic's Friendship, Paving the Way to his Conversion

THE recent death of Bishop Parker, of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India, recalls an incident that took place in his early ministry, when he supplied a small parish in Northern Vermont. I was personally acquainted with Dr. Parker before he was made Bishop and I once heard him tell, in his own quaint way, how a kind act and the ministry of a pitchfork were the means, in God's hands, of the conversion of an avowed sceptic when everything else failed. When I mentioned the matter to Mr. Daniel C. McFarland, the subject of that conversion (which took place nearly forty-three years ago), he vouched for every word of it. Recently I wrote to Mr. McFarland, and he kindly furnished these details of the event, which will interest the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He was born in 1826; his educational opportunities were very limited, and he was early thrown upon the world to work his own way. He grew up somewhat of a sceptic, though having the form of Christianity. He fortunately married a good Christian woman, but after her death, what little faith he had in religion seemed to suffer an entire eclipse. He came to the conclusion that there was no God, and that the religion of Christ was a farce!

Time passed on and he married again, but not a Christian. In 1857 Rev. E. P. Parker was sent to the Lunenburg Circuit. It was a hard field and full of discouragements, but the young preacher's faith was strong. Revivals in those days were more common than now. The new pastor had not been long in town before he found out that many persons were sullenly opposed to the Gospel. One man, a farmer, was pointed out to him as an agnostic. The man was well versed in the usual stock arguments against the Bible, and he was known among his neighbors as an avowed infidel. He had not entered a church in four years. Mr. Parker prayed for him and urged upon him the claims of the Gospel, but his efforts apparently failed.

The preacher and his wife called upon him repeatedly, but apparently made no impression. Next summer (1858) was a very wet season, and the hay crop was a partial failure. One day in August Mr. and Mrs. Parker started out to visit Mr. McFarland's home. As they went along the farmers everywhere seemed to be busy shaking hay and getting it into the barns. It was the only fair day in two weeks. McFarland saw the minister coming and started for the hayfield with a pitchfork over his shoulder. Mr. Parker saw him and followed. McFarland said to himself, "Well, there's that preacher coming to talk religion to me; but he'll find that I cannot stop for that kind of stuff." The minister took in the situation at a glance. Turning to McFarland, he said, "I would like to pitch in and help you to-day if you have no objections." "All right, I'll take the sweat out of you to-day, young man," was the sceptic's sneering answer.

Mr. Parker pitched hay all that morning and afternoon, and worked so well as to tire out McFarland. When night came, all the cut hay was in the barn in good condition. The sceptic was profuse in thanks; he had changed his opinion of preachers. Mr. Parker had won his confidence. The sceptic began to tell his neighbors that any preacher, who could pitch hay as good as Mr. Parker, was worth listening to.

Next Sunday McFarland and family were in church, and they kept it up all that summer and fall. The following winter, under Mr. Parker's ministry, a blessed revival took place in the church, and among the first fruits was the conversion of the agnostic and his wife. After a specially searching sermon, which the agnostic believed to have been aimed at his own heart, Dr. Parker invited him to the parsonage, where he talked with him and prayed with him, concluding by urging him to pray for himself. The stricken man cried out: "O, God! I surrender all to thee!" and soon afterward the great peace filled his soul.

"From that time till to-day," writes Mr. McFarland, "I have been rejoicing in my Saviour."

Scruggles and His Beauty

By MARY C. FRANCIS

THERE may have been a tougher boy on the East Side than Scruggles, but there is no record of the fact. He was twelve, a gamin of the street, a terror to the neighborhood, unkempt in person, and unregenerate as to manners, not to say morals.

There was little that was reprehensible that he had not done. At an earlier stage of his career the roof garden of the Educational Alliance had known him, to the grief of the teachers and the despair of the eminent philanthropists who took pride and delight in the reforming and educative influences of the methods so successfully used there. He had caused a riot by tying a firecracker to the tail of a cat at an otherwise well-conducted Fourth of July celebration; he had frightened a mother into hysterics by swinging her baby out over the end of the pier nearly beaten the life out of him for what he called "running away." Beatings for non-ethical reasons were familiar to Scruggles, and he maintained a strict privacy regarding them which did him no injustice.

After that, when Scruggles foraged far afield, he was more cautious, and he succeeded in getting back from Central Park undiscovered and bearing with him a trophy which might make him at once the envy and butt of the rest of "de gang"—nothing more nor less than a dog, a beautiful little thoroughbred terrier.

Strange to say, the dog had cultivated Scruggles, something no animal had ever had reason to do, and Scruggles had adopted him without knowing it. Coming out of the Park at the Circle the little creature, apparently frightened almost to death, ran at him yelping and barking frantically, circling, turning, leaping, then crouching at his feet with an all but human note of keen distress in the shrill little voice.

For once Scruggles neither kicked the dog or threw a stone at him; he was too much astonished, and not without reason. The dog was thoroughbred from the tip of his dear little nose to the extreme end of his tail, that ended in a highbred curl. He was snow white, and the fine hair was soft, fluffy and silken all over his tiny body, now quivering with intense excitement. His eyes were blue and were scintillating with half shed tears, at least that was the impression Scruggles got, and he picked him up to investigate the more closely. Then, for the first time in his rough young life, he felt the thrillings of fear shooting through the slender frame, and the vibrations in some mysterious manner had a new effect on him. He did not know what that effect was, but involuntarily he stroked the little head, whereupon the dog ceased yelping and gratefully licked his hand.

Scruggles was not the fainting kind; if he had been he would have fainted then and there. He looked furtively around. In that jam and rush characteristic of the great entrance to the Park, no one seemed to notice him. The little dog seemed to realize that he had found a haven, and cuddled down contentedly on Scruggles' tattered and dirty arm; he was still panting and agitated; his body was hot and palpitating, and his tongue stuck out of his red mouth; he was evidently exhausted. He wagged his tail feebly and looked appealingly up into Scruggles' eyes.

That youth snuggled the dog a little closer, with an almost involuntary muscular action, and started eastward. And thence, all the way to Second avenue and Twelfth street he trudged to the unsanitary shelter he called "home," carrying the tiny creature. Long before he had reached it the warmth of the small body against his arm, the unconscious trust, the utter helplessness of the tiny animal had awakened something in Scruggles, and no power in the world could have taken the dog from him without a fight "to the finish." When he finally reached his destination the dog was asleep. It was after eight o'clock, and he had had no supper, but, as his father was on the Island for thirty days, he knew he would at least have no beating; so he curled himself down by the dog and, wearied by his long tramp, fell asleep also.

The next day Scruggles investigated the papers. Sure enough, in a pink evening sheet appeared this advertisement: "Lost, on Thursday, in Central Park, a Maltese terrier, answers to the name of 'Beauty.' Invalid cannot rest without him. Liberal reward." Then followed a name, Randolph Mason, and the address, Seventy-second street, near the Park.

Scruggles did not know exactly what an "invalid" was, but he found out from the nearest newsboy without betraying his ignorance. Then he went back to the dingy little room. "Beauty!" he called to the dog. With dog cries of joy the little creature leaped up and barked until his quivering body seemed ready to burst. He raced back and forth across the floor, his graceful form a white flash, darting in curves and gyrations of delicate agility. Scruggles watched him, fascinated, then he took him up and held him against his face. Beauty, partly from hunger, partly from joy, partly from ethical motives licked the dirty countenance, and kept on licking until in that desert appeared an oasis.

"What's the matter with yer?" cried his sister, passing the door. She stood and laughed at him. "You an' the dog's pretty sick," she continued, "an' half o' yer face is licked off." She tossed a broken hand-glass towards him, and went out with a shrill laugh. Scruggles looked in it. Undoubtedly his face was clean where the dog had licked it. A dark red color crept up under this unwonted area. Scruggles looked at Beauty, and the dog seemed to smile a sagacious and reproving smile as he wagged his tail. Without ado, Scruggles, still carrying Beauty, went down to the sink and washed his face, drying it with the remnants of a sleeve. Then he consulted the glass once more. The general effect was satisfactory, and Scruggles was not yet sufficiently fastidious to note the dark rim about the roots of his hair. In fact, it was a noble first effort. Beauty plainly signified his approval—an approval which did not extend to the unpalatable food which was the best Scruggles was able to afford him—but he ate with zest, and then showed a disposition to play and be played with, and the astonished Scruggles actually exerted himself for most of the evening by associating with a dumb animal on terms of amity, after which completing the day on the street, he was obliged to whip three boys who made fun of him for having a clean face.

The "liberal reward" had now no charms for Scruggles. Beauty was his, "to have and to hold," and no wealthy invalid should have him again. "I ain't sick," he argued to himself, "an' I kin give him a better time than he'd have shut up in a house, an' then bein' dragged out in a park in a carriage an' bein' lost. Why didn't he hold on ter his dog. Ain't that so, Beauty?"

Beauty wagged his tail vehemently and barked intelligently. Being a thoroughbred he was not charmed with his surroundings, and for the same reason he made the best of them. Also, he was undoubtedly grateful, and possibly diplomatic.

At the end of a week, leaving Beauty safe in the seclusion of the dingy little room, Scruggles went on an exploring expedition to Madison avenue and Seventy-second street, and reconnoitered. Fortune favored him. A gust of wind blew the evening paper out of the hand of a maid at the basement steps to the servants' entrance, and Scruggles gallantly chased it across the street, captured it and brought it back to the woman, taking off his cap and bowing profoundly as he did so. The servant was not impervious to the chivalry of the matter, and Scruggles, being clean and having persuaded his sister to mend his clothes, was not unrepresentable, bright, twinkling hazel eyes and a freckled nose lending an individuality of their own to his face. Conversation naturally ensued, and when in a few moments a summer storm broke in a sudden fury of driving rain and cracking thunder, the maid hustled Scruggles down into the servants' quarters, where, amid what was for him luxury, he sat at a table and was made much of, and surrounded by pie, cheese, the remnants of a shrimp salad and a marron glace—not that he knew by name aught but the pie and cheese—Scruggles fed himself and elated his hearers with tales of the East Side. Incidentally he learned all he wanted to know about Beauty's former master, and the old debate of returning the dog came up in his mind as he trudged back to Second avenue, for they had told him that Mr. Mason grieved constantly after his pet, and his rest was so broken that the doctors had to place him under the influence of opiates to get him to sleep.

Before he got back he decided that he would return Beauty. Then as the dog crept over the floor by him in the darkness and cuddled his soft, silken little body against Scruggles' bare breast, felt the warm breath on his cheek and the little tongue licking his forehead, ears and chin, something gave way within Scruggles and in the gloom a thing happened that had never happened to Scruggles in all his brief life—tears flowed silently down his cheeks, and, quietly weeping, he fell asleep.

The struggle that now tore him kept him in distress for three days. Beauty was pining. He resented the confinement and the close air. He missed his baths and the food did not agree with him. In dog fashion he entreated Scruggles, and on the afternoon of the third day, Scruggles borrowed a basket with a lid, put Beauty into it and started up town. This time he went to the front of the big brown stone mansion, and as he came in front of the steps a man, plainly a doctor, came out and was about to enter the waiting carriage when Scruggles stepped up and, taking his cap quite off and bowing very low, said, "How is Mr. Mason?"

The doctor turned in amazement, and regarded Scruggles for a moment before he said: "Why do you ask after Mr. Mason, my boy?"

"I—I've got something for him," said Scruggles. Beauty had succeeded in pushing the lid of the basket partly off, and poking out his alert little head, recognized the doctor, and gave shrill, sharp yelps of joy. The physician gave a start and grabbed Scruggles by the arm.

"Come in, quick," he said, and almost dragged him up the steps. Through a sumptuous entrance hall, down a dimly lighted corridor, past a splendid library, past open doors that revealed every evidence of wealth, they hurried until they reached a bright, sunny room, the windows open, flowers on every hand, and on a luxurious couch near one of the windows an emaciated figure, lying white and languid on the pillow.

"Randolph!" shouted the doctor, "look here." He pushed Scruggles forward. Beauty, now wild with excitement, leaped out of the basket and rushed to the sick man, barking as never dog barked before. The invalid sprang up, embraced the dog, and, with tears rushing down his face, uttered tender words of endearment, while Beauty, almost frantic, barked, yelped, and then, to Scruggles' envy and despair, began to lick his master's face. This was too much. Scruggles turned his head away, feeling such jealousy and blighted hope as falls to the lot of one deserted by a sweetheart.

"Come here, my lad," said the sick man, and Scruggles went, and Beauty stood on his hind legs and looked from one to the other, with a look that plainly said: "I love you both, and you must be friends."

The doctor busied himself by writing on a little paper, and then said: "You won't need this digitalis to-night, Randolph."

"No, and I won't need it again," replied the invalid. "I'll get well now. What is your name, my good boy? Tell me all about it. John, bring a chair."

Scruggles sat down on a chair so soft that it frightened him, and told the sick man all about it, listened to with great attention by the invalid, the doctor and all of the servants who could conveniently pass the door.

It was late when Scruggles left the big brown stone house, and when he did he rode with the doctor in his carriage to Second avenue and Twelfth street, and the doctor held brief converse with Scruggles' mother, who really meant well in her way.

To-day Scruggles is the trusted messenger in a Wall Street banking firm. They call him Edward now, and he is the support of his mother and sister, for the father disappeared after the thirty days on the Island, and perhaps it was just as well, for now they are living comfortably in a modest, up-to-date apartment house, the latest result of the tenement house reform.

Mr. Mason is no longer an invalid, and Beauty is impartially devoted to both, at which you would not be surprised if you had the pleasure of knowing Beauty as well as I do.

[THE END]

STRONG FOOD.

Having the Longest Staying Powers.

It is a good thing to know how to select food that will so thoroughly feed and nourish the body that there is no indication of hunger or faintness from one meal to another.

Grape-Nuts Food will carry the user longer, probably, than any other food known. A young lady attending business college writes from Atlanta, Ga., saying: "Before I began using Grape-Nuts I got so hungry before the dinner hour that I was faint and almost sick, but since I have Grape-Nuts Food for breakfast I study harder, and wait longer for my dinner without experiencing any of the former trouble."

One great advantage is that it requires no cooking or preparation. I wish everyone knew of the value of Grape-Nuts Food for children in school." I. Parkhurst.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

From the Bastille's Dungeon

THE Bastille seemed to be the Land of Forgetfulness. The Governor had so forgotten Cluny, that his name called up no recollection. He did not know whether he was in the prison or not. He did not know whether he was alive or dead. The head gaoler also had forgotten. Men lost their identity within those walls. The very books of the prison had forgotten Cluny. Their keeper grew cross, and positive of Neville's non-entering, as volume after volume refused to give up his name. But Israel and his men, standing there so determined and so silent, forced him to go back and back, until he came to that fateful day when, before the dawning, the young man had been driven within those terrible gates.

"On whose order?" asked Israel, speaking with sharp authority.

"On the order of his Eminence, Cardinal Mazarin," was the answer.

"I thought so," then turning to the head gaoler he added, "you have the order for release. We are in haste."

"Time is not counted here. We know not haste," was the answer.

"Then," said Israel, flaming into passion, "you must learn how to hasten. I give you ten minutes to produce Lord Neville. After that time, I shall return to his Eminence and report your refusal to obey him."

The gaoler had never before been accosted in such language. As word by word was translated to his intelligence, he manifested an unspeakable terror. It was impossible for him to conceive the manner of man and the strange authority that dared so to address the head gaoler of the Bastille. He left the chamber at once, and within the time named there were sounds heard which made all hearts stand still—the slow movement of feet hardly able to walk—the dismal clangor of iron, and anon the mournful sound of a human voice. But nothing could have prepared Cluny's comrades for the sight of their old companion. His tall form was attenuated to the last point; his eyes, unaccustomed to much light, would not at once respond, they looked as if they had lost vision; his hair straggled unkempt over his shoulders, and the awful pallor of the prison on his face and neck and hands was more ghastly than the pallor of death. His clothing had decayed; it hung in shreds about his limbs; but there was a glimmer of his old self in the pitiful effort he made, as soon as conscious of human presence, to lift up his head and carry himself without fear. An irrepressible movement of arms, a low wail of pity, met him as he entered the room, and he looked before him, anxious, intent, but not yet seeing anything distinctly.

"Cluny! Cluny! Cluny!" cried Israel; and then Cluny distinguished the buff and steel uniforms, and knew who it was that called him. A long, sharp cry of agony, wonder, joy, answered the call, and he fell senseless into Israel's arms.

They lifted him to the open window, they laid bare the skeleton form of his chest, they called him by name in voices so full of love and pity that his soul perforce answered their entreaties. Then the Governor offered him some clothing, but Israel put it passionately away. They were worse than Babylonish garments in his sight; he would not touch them. He asked only for a public litter, and when it was procured, they laid Cluny in it, and his comrades bore him through the streets of Paris to their lodging on the outskirts of the city.

When they left the gates of the prison there was a large gathering of men, and it increased as they proceeded—a pitiful crowd, whose very silence was the highest eloquence. For they understood, Cluny lay prone and oblivious to their vision. They had seen him come from the Bastille.

*From The Lion's Whelp, a powerful and fascinating story of Cromwell's time. By Amelia E. Barr. Illustrated. Pp. 382. Cloth covers. Price $1.50. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York, publishers.

He was dead, or dying, and these angry, weeping soldiers were his comrades. They began to mutter, to exclaim, to voice their sympathy more and more intelligibly. Women, praying and weeping audibly, joined the procession, and Israel foresaw the possibility of trouble. He felt that in some way order must be restored, and inspired by the wisdom within, he raised his hands and in a loud, ringing voice, began the favorite hymn of his troopers; and to the words they had been used to sing in moments of triumphal help or deliverance they carried Cluny, with the solemn order of a religious service, safely into their camp. For when the hymn began, the crowd followed quietly, or dropped away, as the stern men trod in military step to their majestic antiphony:

"Lift up your heads, O ye gates,

And the King of glory shall come in."

"Who is the King of glory?"

"The Lord strong and mighty; the Lord mighty in battle.

Lift up your heads, O ye gates,

And the King of glory shall come in."

"Who is this King of glory?"

"The Lord of hosts; the Lord mighty in battle,

He is the King of glory!"

A Notable Book

"THE GREAT HIGHWAY," by James Creelman, the famous war correspondent, is already winning golden opinions. Julian Hawthorne writes: "It is memorable, both as literature and as contemporary history. Nothing else in the same line so authoritative, so vivid and so fascinating has been published within my knowledge."

Max O'Rell says: "It is a work full of electric power. It contains the experiences of a most adventurous and extraordinary life, told with great force and in a brilliant, sparkling style, full of humor and philosophy."

Julian Ralph has this characteristic comment: "The special correspondent is to-day knight-errant, and Creelman has long carried his plume in the van of the adventurous band. In his book we read of a life as strongly contrasted with the lives of the millions of men as was the career of Jeanne d'Arc when the mass of women were men's chattels." The Great Highway is a volume of 418 pp., cloth binding with decorative cover, finely illustrated. Price, postpaid, $1.35. Lothrop Publishing Company, Boston, publishers.

The author has skillfully blended with the romance many thrilling incidents from the Cuban wars. Cloth binding, 266 pages. Price $1.00. The Abbey Press, New York and London, publishers.

I am Going to Buy The Ostermoor Mattress, $15.

BECAUSE PATENT ELASTIC FELT is the modern mattress; the improvement that was bound to come to take the place of the old kinds, which people had to use when there was nothing better or more economical than feathers or hair.

BECAUSE it is healthier. Impervious to moisture, absolutely vermin-proof; a purely vegetable fibre, highly elastic, it cannot possibly carry such germs of filthy diseases as the choicest hair—from dead horses—is liable to.

BECAUSE it wears better. Never mats, gets out of shape nor grows lumpy; and doesn't have to be "done over" every few years as all hair mattresses must. The airy, interlacing, fibrous sheets, each of the full size of the mattress, are laid on the bottom of the tick, then the top and sides are closed in around them. They are constructed not stuffed.

BECAUSE such people as the Astors, the Iselins, the Vanderbilts and scores of others equally well known, who are good judges and aren't bothered by matters of price, use them. Their testimonials are in "The Test of Time."

BECAUSE it is the best to be had at any price, and I can get my money back if I am not satisfied after trying one thirty nights—express charges paid both ways.

BECAUSE no dealer can sell it. I am not going to be fooled by the claims that there is something else "just as good" as the Ostermoor, but shall send my money direct to the makers.

In a letter dated Hsi-an-fu (Shensi), Sept. 14, via Hankow, Dr. Duncan writes as follows:

"The officials have given every facility for arriving at a satisfactory estimate of the places where distress is most severe, and also in rendering every assistance in discovering those in greatest need. The first thing done was to invite us to food, and talk over the condition of affairs and decide upon the districts to be helped. Hsi-an City was first to be relieved, as the need seemed the greatest. The fact that there has been official and imperial relief given here in the winter, drew a large number of the destitute to this place in the hope of obtaining relief. Then the populace here has little or no land on which to rely for subsistence. We decided, at the strong recommendation of Yang Tao Tai, who has been in full charge of all the Government relief in the Province during the year, to begin here, and then take on other places as money and need seemed to decide. We apportioned the funds as follows: For this city (with a population of nearly a million), 30,000 taels; for the Tung Chou prefecture, 6,000 taels; for the Christians in eight districts, 6,000 taels; for relief in the Ch'ien Chou district, 6,000 taels.

"The balance to be distributed in the most needy parts of San Yuan Ling Tung and Kao Lin districts. The Swedish missionary, Mr. Tjader, is distributing the relief in Tung Chou. Mr. Trudinger, an Australian, is to help here and in the H'ien Chou district. We hope that by another mail we will be able to give you more particulars as to the details and working of the arrangements. We are right in the thick of the work. The Chinese have a special regard for America as the one nation that has no axe to grind, and look to her to uphold their rights and help their cause. It is, therefore, a great pleasure to them to have help from the friendliest of foreign lands.

"Yours fraternally,
"MOIR B. DUNCAN."

Another letter says: "The severity of the famine in Shensi may be gauged from the fact that not fewer than thirty per cent. of the population have already fallen before the scourge. This is the official return of the death-rate, resulting from the lack of bread. In no previous famine has the Government displayed greater energy in coping with the distress.

"Relief measures were begun in the seventh moon of last year (1900) and have been continued ever since—a period of thirteen months. In sixty-three out of the eighty-three districts distress prevailed, and these sums have been spent in relief:

By the Imperial Government,	$120 Wan of taels
By the Provincial Government,	300 " "
From the other provinces,	30 " "
Borrowed from Kansu province,	20 " "
Received from the sale of offices,	50 " "

Private charities, $520 Wan, 35 Wan

Total, 555 Wan

"Approximately nearly 4,000,000 dollars

"The officials have done all that could be either desired or expected in assisting the distributors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. The first place to be assisted was the Western Capital, as Hsi-an-fu is now called. The city was divided into eight districts, and thoroughly canvassed from door to door to discover those in greatest need. About 50,000 have already been helped.

"The work is proceeding in other districts as the funds will allow. Mr. Tjader, of the Swedish Mission, is acting in the Tung Chou Prefecture, and Mr. Trudinger, of the C. I. M., in the west of Hsi-an. The help has been timely, tiding over the pinch between the stoppage of official relief and the reaping of the autumn harvest."

THE STONE RANSOM FUND

UP to November 10, no definite news had been received concerning the release of Ellen M. Stone, the missionary captured by brigands in Bulgaria. A letter had, however, been recently received by her friends, which stated that both the missionary and her companion, Mme. Tsika, were alive and in good health. There are still hopes of her early release.

A Martyr at Fourteen

A missionary lately returned from China, describing some of the native converts who were martyred during the Boxer outbreak, writes: "Li Rutang's only child, a bright girl of 14 years of age, fled after her father's death, taking with her a New Testament. Some relatives wished to save her, but said she must burn her book. She refused. She ran with the book under her arm into the millet. She was not known by any of the Boxers. She was discovered in the millet. Her book was testimony, and the only testimony, against her. She was brought to the place of execution, and asked if she was a believer. She replied she was. The child fearlessly stood before the tormentors, who asked her if she were not afraid. 'Afraid or not afraid, it is all one,' she replied. But with a smile she met the sword which cut her down."

CHILDREN of GOD

The Clue to Attaining Divine Sonship is in Yielding to the Leading of the Holy Spirit

IN one sense, all men are sons of God. Paul told the Athenians that they were his sons though they knew nothing of Christianity. Deriving their being from God, depending for their continued life on his bounty, they must be his children. But that is the involuntary and the lowest idea of sonship. It may exist with the densest ignorance, even with rebellion. A man who does not recognize the relationship, and the man who does know it, but lives as an enemy of God, is still a child of God in that mechanical sense of the word. But there is a higher sense, as the Apostle intimates, in which a man may be a son of God. In our human relationships we appreciate this difference. The degenerate son of a good man does not seem so much his son as does a boy of honorable and clean life. The father deprecates his son's degeneracy, and would rejoice over his repentance and reform. That is how God feels towards erring men. When they are restored and yield themselves to the Spirit's influence—are led of the Spirit, is the Apostle's phrase—they become godly, or God-like, and are, in the true sense, his sons. As the father in the parable of the Prodigal Son said, his son "was dead, and is alive again, was lost, and is found." The wayward son was his son all the time he was away, but his filial nature was dead, and only when it revived did the father recover the son whom he had lost.

This view of human nature makes a life of sin all the more deplorable. We are not so much surprised when a lad born in the slums takes to evil ways, but when a youth who has been reared in a respectable home by godly parents becomes a reprobate, the calamity seems far worse. So when men forget their divine sonship and voluntarily give themselves to evil ways the disaster is appalling. Apart from revelation there is enough in human nature to give a clue to the fact of sonship. Near akin as we are to the brutes, and so much nearer than we formerly supposed, the difference between us and them is immense. That one divine spark of the soul, existing even in the most degraded man, differentiates him from the most intelligent dog. He is clearly of a higher order of being. The attributes of God, as we know them, in his power over the universe, in his intelligent action toward a definite goal and in his moral sense, are all reflected in man. He has a divine nature nearer akin to God than to the brutes. His supremacy in the world is no mere titular, but a very real, thing. Animals far stronger than he, he harnesses and drives to work for him. The forces of nature have, one after another, been subjugated until even the lightning, once his dread, is now so controlled as to give him light and communication, and motive power. Only on the spiritual side does he appear to lack God-likeness. And even there the capacity is present, though it is often altogether dormant. But glimpses of it we do see. The tenderness, the helpfulness, the pity, the magnanimity sometimes displayed by even wicked men, are flashes of divinity showing the latent sonship of God.

How, then, can this latent power be developed? This is the great problem of humanity which can never be solved apart from revelation. The spiritual capacity needs quickening and it needs power. It was this need which brought the Son of God to earth and it has proved true that to as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God. Man has a part in his own development, but it is a receptive one. The power comes from God, but it is not operative unless man yields to it. His experience in the material world furnishes the clue to his procedure. All his triumphs over nature have been won by adapting himself to natural law. When he has discovered the existence of a law, he has not opposed it, but has applied the law to his purposes. Water will not run up hill, and the man who attempted to make it do so would only waste his time. What he has to do is to adapt his machinery to the known law and then the water will work for him. When we learned what electricity would do, we had simply to provide the apparatus by which its power could be utilized. So it is in spiritual matters. If a man will yield himself to the influence of the Holy Spirit, he is in the way of infinite development. So long as he resists, it is useless to him. Christ came that men might have life and might have it more abundantly. That life he gives freely and its effects are marvelous. It cleanses and it invigorates. It brings moral order into the soul, where before anarchy prevailed. So great is the change, that Christ described it correctly as a new birth. From the time it is received the man as a spiritual being begins to grow. He is a son of God, partaker of his nature. His education begins and endless possibilities of development are placed within his reach. In this way, and in no other, can men become in very truth the children of God.

A further inducement is added by the Apostle to that of spiritual development. Not only does the man in becoming a child of God attain a more perfect humanity, but he gains an assurance of inheritance "If children then heirs." We understand very well the enviable position of the youth who is heir to a great estate, but what is it to be an heir of God himself? This is promised to those who have been born again.

"A Book from Heaven"

"Some years after Shansi province was opened to the Gospel" (writes a member of the China Inland Mission) "a missionary passed through the hill district of Tanning and sold a copy of Mark. That Gospel found its way to one of the temples, and there was found by a priest named Chang. He took the book home to his village, and, being unable to read it himself, asked his village teacher, Ku, to read it to him. These two commenced studying the book. Soon they came to the conclusion that the book, as they said, was from heaven. Day by day, night by night, they studied it. In a short time both gave up their idolatry, and turned to the Lord. After about three years, they first heard that there was a missionary in the prefectural city of P'ing-yang Fu, three days' journey away. They went down to visit him, and soon Chang and Ku were baptized. They began to think of their former co-religionists living some five days distant. They went up there, and God blessed their visit, and eight families put away their idols. That was the commencement of our little Hsiao-i church, where there are now some seventy in fellowship. Chang is pastor of the church. The Boxers three times sought his life. He hid in the hills, but God delivered him."

COFFEE COMPLEXION.

Many Ladies Have Poor Complexions from Coffee.

"Coffee caused dark colored blotches on my face and body. I had been drinking it for a long while, and these blotches gradually appeared, until finally they became permanent and were about as dark as coffee itself.

I formerly had as fine a complexion as one could ask for.

When I became convinced that coffee was the cause of my trouble, I changed and took to using Postum Cereal Food Coffee, and as I made it well, according to directions, I liked it very much, and have since that time used it entirely in place of coffee.

I am thankful to say I am not nervous any more, as I was when I was drinking coffee, and my complexion is now as fair and good as it was years ago. It is very plain that the coffee caused the trouble. Please omit my name from public print. Mrs. —, 2081 Ogden Ave., Chicago, Ill." The name of this lady can be given by the Postum Cereal Co., Limited, Battle Creek, Mich.

Most bad complexions are caused by some disturbance of the stomach, and coffee is the greatest disturber of digestion known. Almost any woman can have a fair complexion if she will leave off coffee and use Postum Food Coffee and nutritious, healthy food in proper quantity. The food coffee furnishes certain parts of the natural grains from the field that nature uses to rebuild the nervous system, and when that is in good condition one can depend upon a good complexion as well as a general healthy condition of the body.

Commission of the Deliverer
Self-Confidence and Self-Distrust Changed to Faith

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

A REAL cry to God, a real appeal to him for help, not by way of experiment, but through a belief in his power and his willingness, never goes unheard. "The children of Israel sighed by reason of the bondage," it told their anguish, but it did nothing for them; a sigh is addressed to nobody. Then, however, they cried to God in their trouble, "their cry came up unto God," and God heard their groaning, "remembered his covenant," "saw," and "took knowledge" (Gen. 3: 23-25, R. V.). And yet they did not get the answer. But while their cry was going to God, he was at work. He saw in this a turning from the gods of Egypt, and a turning of the people for the deliverance which was in his heart to give them. He was working in Midian on the education of the deliverer, while the oppressed people in Egypt were crying for deliverance. Let us say that prayer is unanswered because it does not immediately see how God is answering. Moses was keeping the sheep of his father-in-law; and, by the providence of God, was made to Horeb, the mountain which should be signalized in future as a place where God would again and again manifest himself. Moses' education in the desert had not been vain; his self reliance was gone, he would no longer rush on before God, and take matters into his own hands; but he had yet much to learn of confidence in God. Forty years before, Moses had thought to undertake the deliverance of his people; but Joseph had died before he died, "God will surely visit me, and bring you out of this land," Moses, forestalling God, had really retarded the deliverance of his people instead of furthering it. But now God had arisen, and the thing was going to be done. "I am come down to deliver them." Come, now, therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh, that thou mayest bring forth my people, the children of Israel, out of Egypt. But Moses still stood in the way of his God. Instead of self-reliance, he was now filled with distrust, but it was self all the same. It was not now the thought of how great he was, or how little he was that occupied him; who am I that I should go unto Pharaoh? he says. He had yet to learn that the great matter was not what he was nor who he was, but what God was, and what he was going to do. "Certainly I will be with thee," ought to have satisfied him; this had been the inspiration and the power of the life of Joseph. But Moses had yet to be conquered before he could become a fit instrument for his great work; he was not yet fully trusting. God's plan was so different to what he had expected. Moses' education in philosophy, science and natural law had left its mark upon him, and he had not yet come into the simplicity of faith. He continued to make objections, although God had assured him of ultimate success. Just now his former experience was longer in his eyes than the Word of God. "Behold, they will not believe me," he said, "or hearken unto my voice" (Gen. 4: 1). He had no confidence that God had been working on the people, but expected to find them as he had left them. This was flatly contradicting God, who had said, "They shall hearken to thy voice" (3: 18). And yet the Lord had patience with his timid, doubting servant. With the presence of God, with his message already put into his mouth, with a power given to him to work miracles, with God's assurance that the elders of Israel should listen to him, and that Pharaoh, who should be his first oppose, should be overcome in the end, on what ground could Moses make any other opposition? The man who had been unconscious of himself, of his position, of his power in deeds and also in words, now says, "O Lord, I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor since thou hast spoken to thy servant; for I am slow of speech and of a slow tongue." What a change had come over the man who had been mighty in word! He was now out of practice in public speaking, his training was probably much forgotten, and there was everything in his circumstances to make him shrink from the impossible task, of publicly speaking, which lay before him. Nothing could enable him for it but a confidence in God which made him lose sight of himself. But unbelief is no excuse for disobedience. God succeeded in the end, for in the sketch of him as a man of faith in Hebrew it is said, he "endured as seeing him who is invisible." It is most instructive to mark the patience with which God met all the distrust of his servant on the ground of his own incapacity, the consideration of who he was who had said, "Certainly I will be with thee" (Gen. 4: 1). "Who hath made man's mouth? . . . Is it not I the Lord? Now, therefore, go, and tell him to thy mouth, and teach thee what thou shalt speak." Oh, how long it is before we come to the point of trusting our God to do for us in critical moments, when and what we speak, and when to be silent. Moses was yet trustful, but what could he ask more?

He was unreasonable. If God were real, and if he indeed would be true to his word, Moses could not be better equipped. But he felt nothing, saw nothing. He had only him who is invisible to rest upon, and, as yet, he was not fully weaned from the visible. "O Lord," he says, "send, I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send." And God was angry, justly angry, and made a compromise which cost Moses dear. He gave him Aaron his brother, to be spokesman for him, the man who, when Moses was in the mountain forty days and forty nights, led the people in their worship of the golden calf (Exod. 32: 1-6). Moses must learn yet another lesson before he was fit to be the leader God had destined him to be: things in his family must be put right. His father-in-law was made willing to part with him, and on the journey God gave him the full message which he was to deliver to the king of Egypt, when he should harden his heart, "Thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, my first-born; and I have said unto thee, Let my son go that he may serve me, and thou hast refused to let him go; behold, I will slay thy son, thy first-born." But how about Moses' first-born? The child was as yet uncircumcised. Undoubtedly this was a bone of contention between the parents. But God must have his place in Moses' family. God met Moses on the journey at the rest-house, and sought to kill him. Moses understood God's purpose, and at once commanded his wife to circumcise the child; and in spite of hard words from her, it was done, and Moses lived. The Lord brought about the meeting of Moses and Aaron in that very "mountain of God" where he had appeared to Moses, and there he told his brother all that God had revealed to him. They went together into Egypt, and together spoke to the elders of Israel, and "did the signs in the sight of the people." And it came to pass just as God had said, "the people believed; and when they had heard that the Lord had visited the children of Israel, and that he had seen their afflictions, then they bowed their heads and worshipped," and Moses' ministry was begun.

THE Larkin Idea is simply to save that cost which adds nothing to value. The wholesale and retail dealers' expenses, profits and losses saved to our customers on a $10.00 assortment (purchaser's selection) of the Larkin Soaps and Toilet Preparations pay for a $10.00 Premium. The prejudice prevails that goods with which premiums are given, and the premiums too, are inferior in quality.

The Larkin Soaps and Larkin Premiums were exhibited at the Pan-American Exposition in the beautiful Larkin Building, where hundreds of thousands observed and remarked their value, and where six medals, two of gold, were awarded for supreme merit. The Larkin Soaps are known to millions of users to be the best. They are scientifically made from pure materials in the most modern factory. This is our twenty-seventh year of increasing success, and we are the only large manufacturers selling direct to the homes.

$10 Secures $480 Lot IN GREATER NEW YORK...

Opportunity to Make Money Same Way Astors Did—Greatest Offer Ever Known in New York—Will Double in Value upon Completion of New Bridge—Guaranteed to Increase in Value 20% Within One Year—Land is in New York City and City Improvements are Being Made—Only 35 Minutes from New York City Hall—Free Trip to New York City and Return

EVERY one knows that more money has been made by the increase in value of property in New York City, than any where else in America. Many of the wealthiest families have made millions simply by the natural increase in 10, 20 or 30 years. Manhattan Island is very much crowded, but when the circle was enlarged recently, the opportunities were extended, and now there is just as good an opportunity to repeat what has been done in past years, in Greater New York; especially now that the great rivers are being bridged and tunneled,—bringing Brooklyn and Kings County as close to New York City Hall, as many of the most valuable sections of Manhattan Island.

Then, again, the crowded condition of Manhattan Island has caused thousands of families to seek homes in a section of the city more favorably situated, because it is less crowded, and there is room for detached dwellings and lawns, gardens, etc. Many of the most popular sections of the city have been beautifully parked and the streets paved with asphalt, so that property is very readily rented and sold.

The Astors and our wealthiest families have made their money from the increase in value of real estate. You can prove this point if you will take the pains to look it up. New York City property has increased in value more than that of any other place because of its enormous growth in population, and this growth of values and population is still going on. Since the consolidation of New York and Brooklyn, the increased facilities of rapid transit by bridge trolley, and elevated, the immense tide of increased population has turned Brooklynward. The attention of the public has been called to the great advantages of Brooklyn because it is only in that section that New York can grow—please note that point, as it is the keynote to the situation. The influx of people into Brooklyn is so great as to severely tax Brooklyn Bridge—as a result new bridges are being built (one of which is nearly completed) and tunnels are being dug beneath the East River. Not only is Brooklyn Borough the only section in which New York can grow, but property in old New York City, the same distance from City Hall, would cost 20 to 40 times the money—note that point carefully, it is absolutely true.

Listen to Our Story. It is our business to study conditions existing or possible in the various cities of the United States, and we have aided in the development of 25 different cities. After 12 years' careful study in New York without purchasing, in 1898 we saw the trend of affairs, and before the consolidation of New York and Brooklyn we bought over 1,100 acres of the choicest land in Brooklyn, and which is now in the heart of that Borough. This land is only 3½ miles from Brooklyn Bridge and is only 35 minutes from New York City Hall. We have over $2,000,000 invested in this land and are making it one of the most beautiful spots of New York. The growth of the city, together with our improvements, have increased the value of the property over 25 per cent. since a year ago, and we feel so sure that the increase will continue, that we think there is no risk in guaranteeing a 20% increase for the next year.

Illustrations. Lot on corner 146th street and 3d avenue, New York city, worth in 1881, $1,500, sold in spring of 1901 for $70,000 to Henry Lewis Morris. His grandfather sold it for $155 in 1853.

Lot on 80th street, opposite Central Park, sold in 1850 for $500, in 1901 brought a price that showed an increase of $500 every sixty days from 1850 to 1901. Authority, Real Estate Editor New York Sun.

Listen to Our Proposition. Our property is improved in exact accordance with City Specifications. Streets 60, 80 and 100 feet wide, built to City grade, bordered on each side by 5 feet granolithic cementine sidewalks, flower beds and shrubbery, city water, gas, etc., all at our expense. For $10 down and $1.50 per week, or $6.00 per month, we sell you a regular New York City lot, subject to the following guarantees from us:

If at the expiration of the year 1902 this lot is not worth $576.00, we will refund all of the money you have paid us with 6 per cent. interest additional.

If you should die at any time before payments have been completed we will give to your heirs a deed to the lot without further cost.

If you should get out of employment or be sick you will not forfeit the land.

Send Us $10.00 down and we will reserve you one of the best unsold lots, then you may pay $6.00 per month until the full amount is paid; this gives you all the benefit of the increase in value from the time you make the first payment; or if you are at all interested, we will send you maps and full information free.

and 30,000 customers all over the United States, and especially the one at the bottom of this page; this is only one of thousands.

You will note three distinct points of advantage in this proposition. First—It is Life Insurance for your family. Second—It enables you to pay in small sums as you would in your savings bank, and cannot cramp you; and, Third—it enables you to participate in the great growth of values New York real estate which are due to natural conditions; and, furthermore, the three advantages are absolutely without risk.

FREE TRIP TO NEW YORK

As a further guarantee of good faith, we agree with all persons living East of Chicago to pay you in cash the cost of your railroad fare to New York and return when you visit our property and find one word in this advertisement a misrepresentation, in case you buy to credit cost of the trip to you on your purchase; to those living farther away than Chicago we will pay that proportion equal to cost of fare to Chicago and return. We would advise you, if you are satisfied, to send first payment, $10 in cash, at our risk, immediately, and we will select the very best lot for you. Or, if you desire further particulars, to write immediately for map, details, and information. It will cost you nothing to find out and thoroughly satisfy yourself. We solicit closest investigation. References by hundreds. Our reputation is national.

As an Investment, we believe this to be one of the safest, surest and most profitable that could be entered into. It is safer than a Savings Bank, as it is not subject to panic, while the prospective profits are infinitely greater. It is the surest because as a matter of history, New York City property has steadily increased in value ever since the city was originally formed. It is bound to be profitable because there is no other land within the same distance of New York City Hall that can be had for anything near as low a price. This because New York has become so congested that the "dense belt" has advanced to the very gates of our properties, which are immediately in the line of this development.

A STREET SCENE IN TIENSIN TO-DAY

FRANCIS H. NICHOLS

JUNKS ON THE PEIHO RIVER

• A • RELIEF • JOURNEY • ACROSS • CHINA •

Our Correspondent Tells of Mr. Allen's Perilous Mule-back Trip, with the Silver Sycee, to Succor Singan

BELOW is the first of a series of letters from Mr. Francis H. Nichols, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's special correspondent, who lately went to China for the express purpose of visiting the famine provinces. His letters, with the accompanying illustrations, constitute the first actual history of the great famine that has yet appeared:

TIENSIN, October 8, 1901.

In the province of Shensi, "thirty per cent. of the population have perished. In Singan city alone, according to reliable investigations, there are some fifty thousand destitute." Such is the first information of famine conditions which I have encountered on my arrival in China.

As the traveler from the Occident stands here on the threshold of the Chinese Empire, the first impression which it produces upon him is its vastness and diversity. The mountain provinces are almost as far acry from the seacoast as Tientsin is from America. Tientsin and talked over the famine. This is what he told me: "Rains have recently fallen in Shansi, but drought and famine still continue in Shensi; and consequently it is on that province that the Relief Committee has recently concentrated its efforts. Mr. Moir B. Duncan, a member of the Committee, has charge of the relief work in Singan, Shensi's capital, while Dr. Edwards is at T'ai-yuan, in Shansi."

The difficulties of distributing famine relief in China have this year been exceptionally great, owing to the unsettled condition of the country. In fact, to hear to forward it a few hundred miles. Before the recent disturbances it was easily possible to send taels into the interior by a clumsy sort of Chinese bank draft; but these are no longer issued and are now almost an unknown quantity in the inland provinces. Consequently, any attempt to get relief funds to Shensi is a task of no ordinary magnitude. The first taels, 15,000, for Singan, were sent on mule-back over the mountains. It is safe to say that very few Americans know what a tael is. As a coin, it does not exist. It is only a measure of weight of silver bullion, which is the nearest approach to a uniform currency that China possesses. The bullion is cast into molds in the shape of shoes, which give it the name of "sycee" (Chinese for shoe).

These shoes of silver are packed in cases specially made for the purpose, and are very heavy, two of them being as much as one mule can carry. It was in this cumbersome fashion that the first relief for the hungry went over six hundred miles into the distant town of Singan.

ing, and the remnants of many burned villages and them, are still concerned with little else than foreign indemnities, repairing railroads, and the aftermath of Boxers. The famine is another and a faraway question. For all practical purposes it might be another country. But there is one place where the famine is not forgotten. To find it, you must have your rickshaw put you down at the gate in the stone wall which encloses the compound of the American Board of Foreign Missions. This is the temporary home of the Rev. Arthur Smith, Chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Relief Fund. The compound seems like a breath of Christian America pressed upon this distracted, trouble-torn land. Within the quiet of its shaded walks and gray stone buildings, one can for the moment forget the ruined buildings outside, and the foreign sentries in the crowded, dusty streets, who are perpetually challenging the scared rickshaw men and half-naked coolies.

Mr. Smith gave me a real American welcome, and we sat down on the sofa in his front parlor and from Dr. Smith's lips the story of what has had to be overcome, makes one wonder that anything has been accomplished at all. In the first place, the most trustworthy assistants in relief distribution, would naturally be the native Christians. They are almost the only persons upon whom the missionaries can rely for an investigation of cases of individual suffering. In Shensi, many of them have been massacred and the survivors scattered. Only during the last few months have a few remnants of formerly large congregations begun to straggle back to the stations of the returned missionaries. These few surviving Christian Chinamen, absolutely forgetful of all they have suffered at the hands of their enemies, are now, under the direction of Mr. Duncan, earnestly engaged in the work of "doing good to those who have spitefully used them." They are the chief agencies co-operating with the Relief Committee in feeding the hungry. But they are not nearly so numerous as they were, less than two years ago, and their places are hard to fill.

Sending money in China is a very different operation to what it is in America. $20,000 can be cabled from New York to Tientsin in a few hours. But when that sum is reduced to taels it may take days, even weeks,

Mr. Duncan had preceded it by a few days, and had arranged for its distribution. The man who had charge of the caravan was Mr. Edgar Pierce Allen. He is an American, who has lived many years in China, and has a large practice in the Chinese courts as a lawyer. To carry such an amount of treasure through a disorganized country was a work of considerable danger and great responsibility. But Mr. Allen accepted it at Dr. Smith's request. At his own risk, and at great inconvenience to himself, he became the Committee's agent in transferring American dollars into food in the mountains of China. He has to-day told me the story of his journey.

At the request of Mr. Conger, Mr. Allen was provided by Li Hung Chang with a special passport, called a "Hoo Chow," and a letter of instructions to officials en route, called a "Choen Pai." "To Tingchow, the first stage of the journey," Mr. Allen said, "the sycee was carried on a railroad train, on which I was a passenger. The railroad officials refused to take any

VICTORIES OF PLOW HAMMER AND PEN

TEXTS

HE THAT PLOWETH SHOULD PLOW IN HOPE -- I. CORINTHIANS 9: 10
HE THAT SMOOTHETH WITH THE HAMMER -- ISAIAH 41: 7
THEY THAT HANDLE THE PEN OF THE WRITER -- JUDGES 5: 14

THERE is a table being spread across the top of the two great ranges of mountains which ridge this continent—a table which reaches from the Atlantic to the Pacific seas. It is the Thanksgiving table of the nation.

They will come from the East and the West and the North and the South, and sit at it. On it are smoking the products of all lands, birds of every aviary, cattle from every pasture, fish from every lake, feathered spoils from every farm. The fruit baskets bend down under the products plucked from the peach fields of Maryland, the apple orchards of Western New York, the orange groves of Florida, the vineyards of Ohio, and the nuts threshed from New England woods. The bread is white from the wheat fields of Illinois and Michigan, the banqueters are adorned with California gold, and the table is agleam with Nevada silver, and the feast is warmed with the fire-grates heaped up with Pennsylvania coal. The hall is spread with carpets from Lowell mills, and at night the lights will flash from bronzed brackets of Philadelphia manufacture. The fingers of Massachusetts girls have hung the embroidery; the music is the drumming of ten thousand mills, accompanied by the shout of children let loose for play, and the gladness of harvesters driving barnward the loads of sheaves, and the thanksgivings of the nation which crowd the celestial gates with doxologies until the oldest harper of heaven cannot tell where the terrestrial song ends and the celestial song begins.

Welcome, Thanksgiving Day! Whatever we may think of New England theology, we all like New England Thanksgiving Day. What means the steady rush to the depots and the long rail trains darting their lanterns along the tracks of the Boston and Lowell, the Georgia Central, the Chicago Great Western, the St. Paul and Duluth, and the Southern Railway? Ask the happy group in the New England farm-house. Ask the villagers whose song of praise in the morning will come over the Berkshire hills. Ask all the plantations of the South which have adopted the New England custom of setting apart a day of thanksgiving. Oh, it is a great day of national festivity! Clap your hands, ye people, and shout aloud for joy! Through the organ pipes let there come down the thunder of a nation's rejoicing! Blow the cornet! Wave the palm branches! "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness and for His wonderful works to the children of men!"

For two years and a half this nation has been celebrating the triumph of sword and gun and battery. We have sung martial airs and cheered returning heroes, and sounded the requiem for the slain in battle. Methinks it will be a healthful change if on this year's Thanksgiving in church and homestead we celebrate the victories of the plow, the hammer, and the pen; for nothing was done at Santiago or Manila that was of more importance than that which in the last year has been done in farmer's field, and mechanic's shop, and author's study by those who never wore an epaulette, or shot a Spaniard, or went a hundred miles from their own doorsill. Come up, farmers and mechanics and literary men, and get your dues as far as I can pay them.

Things have marvelously changed. Time was when the stern edict of Government forbade religious assemblages. Those who dared to be so unloyal to their king as to acknowledge loyalty to the Head of the Universe were punished. Churches awfully silent in worship suddenly heard their doors swung open and down upon the church aisle a score of muskets thumped as the leaders bade them "Ground arms!" This custom of having the fathers, the husbands, the sons and brothers at the entrance of the pew, is a custom which came down from olden time, when it was absolutely necessary that the father or brother should sit at the end of the church pew fully armed to defend the helpless portion of the family. But now, how changed! Severe penalties are threatened against any one who shall interrupt religious services, and annually, at the command of the highest official in the United States, we gather together for thanksgiving and holy worship. To-day I would stir your souls to joyful thanksgiving while I speak of the mercies of God, and in unconventional way recount the conquests of the plow, the hammer and pen.

Most of the implements of husbandry have been superseded by modern inventions, but the plow has never lost its reign. It has furrowed its way through all the ages. Its victories have been waved by the barley of Palestine, the wheat of Persia, the flax of Germany, the rice stalks of China, the rich grasses of Italy. It has turned up the mammoth of Siberia, the mastodon of Egypt, and the pine groves of Thessaly. Its iron foot hath marched where Moses wrote, and Homer sang, and Aristotle taught, and Alexander mounted his war charger. It hath wrung its colter on Norwegian wilds, and ripped out the stumps of the American forest, pushing its way through the savannahs of the Carolinas, and trembling in the grasp of the New Hampshire yeomanry. American civilization hath kept step with the rattle of its clevises, and on its beam hath ridden thrift and national plenty.

I do not wonder that the Japanese and the Chinese and the Phœnicians so particularly extolled husbandry, or that Cincinnati went from the consulship to the plow, or that Noah was a farmer before he became a shipbuilder, or that Elisha was in the field plowing with twelve yoke of oxen when the mantle fell on him, or that the Egyptians in their paganism worshipped the ox as a tiller of their lands.

Piltheus, the king, found some rich gold mines in his province, so he turned all the population to digging in the mines. Tillage was neglected, and there came a great famine. One day the wife of the king invited him to a great banquet, and he came in and sat down, and there were pieces of gold in the shape of bread, and pieces of gold in the shape of biscuits, and pieces of gold in the shape of joints of meat, and the king was disgusted, and he said: "I cannot eat this." "Neither can the people," said his wife most suggestively, and then they went back to the tillage.

To get an appreciation of what the American plow has accomplished I take you into the Western wilderness. Here in the dense forest I find a collection of Indian wigwams. With belts of wampum the men lazily sit on the skins of deer, smoking their feathered calumets; or, driven forth by hunger, I track their mocassins far away as they make the forest echoes crazy with their wild halloo, or fish in the waters of the still lake. Now tribes challenge, and council fires blaze, and warwhoops ring, and chiefs lift the tomahawks for battle. After a while, wagons from the Atlantic coast come to those forests. By day trees are felled, and by night bonfires keep off the wolves. Log cabins rise, and the great trees begin to throw their branches in the path of the conquering white man. Farms are cleared. Stumps, the monuments of slain forests, crumble and are burned. Villages appear, with smiths at the bellows, masons on the wall, carpenters on the housetop. Churches rise in honor of the Great Spirit whom the redmen ignorantly worship. Steamers on the lake convey merchandise to her wharf, and carry East the uncounted bushels that have come to the market. Bring hither wreaths of wheat and crowns of rye, and let the mills and the machinery of barn and field unite their voices to celebrate triumph, for the wilderness hath retreated, and the plow hath conquered.

"The Plow has never lost its reign."

Within our time the Presidential Cabinet has added a Secretaryship of Agriculture. Societies are constantly being established for the education of the plow. Journals devoted to this department are circulated through all the country. Farmers, through such culture, have learned the attributes of soils, and found out that almost every field has its peculiar preferences. Lands have their choice as to which product they will bear. Many lowlands touched by the plow rise and wring their wet locks in the trenches. Islands born down on the coast of Peru and Bolivia, are transported to our fields and make our vegetation leap. Highways, by this plow, are changed from boggy sloughs, to roads like the Roman Appian Way. Fields go through bloodless revolutions until there the farm-house stands. In summer, honeysuckles clamber over the trellises, on one side, there stands a garden, which is only a far condensed. On the other side, there is a stretch of meadow land with thick grass, and, as the waves breathe over it, it looks like the deep green ocean waves. There goes a brook, tarrying long in its windings, as if loath to leave the spot where the reeds stand, and the cattle stand at noonday under the shadow of the weeping willows. In winter, the sled comes through the crackling snow, with huge logs from the woods, and the barn-floor quakes under the thumpings of the sled, or the deafening buzz of the threshing-machine. Horses stand beneath mow-poles bending under loads of hay, and whinny to the well-filled oat-bins. Comfort lauds at the wind rattling the sashes and clicking the icicles from the eaves.

Parts of our country, under industrious tillage, have become an Eden of fruitfulness, in which religion stands as the tree of life, and educational advantages as a tree of knowledge of good and evil, not one of them forbidden. We are ourselves surrounded by well-tended farms. They were worked by your fathers, and perhaps your mothers helped spread the hay in the field. On their headstones are the names you bear. As, when you were boys, in the sultry noon you sought for the harvest field with refreshments for your fathers, and found them taking their noon spell sound asleep under the trees, so peacefully now they sleep in some country churchyard. No more fatigued, Death has plowed for them the deep furrow of a grave.

Although most of us have nothing directly to do with the tillage of the soil, yet in all our occupations we feel the effect of successful or blighted industry. We meet, in all our occupations, rejoice over the victories of the plow to-day. The earth was once cursed for man's sake, and occasionally the soil revenges itself on us by refusing a bountiful harvest. I suppose that but for the earth would be producing wheat and corn and sweet fruits as naturally as now it produces mullein stalks and Canada thistles. There is hardly a hillock between the forests of Maine and the lagoons of Florida, between the peach orchards of New Jersey and the pines of Oregon, that has not sometimes shown its natural total depravity. The thorn and thistle seem to have usurped the soil, and nothing but the rebellion of the plow can uproot the evil supremacy. But God is good. Now, if one of our seasons partially proves a failure, the earth seems to repent of it the next summer in its munificent supply.

Praise God for the great harvests that have been reaped this last year! Some of them injured by drought or insects, or freshets, were not as bountiful as usual, others far in excess of what have ever before been gathered, while higher prices will help make up for any decreased supply. Sure sign of agricultural prosperity we have in the fact that cattle, and horses, and sheep, and swine, and all farm animals have, during the last two years, increased in value. Twenty million swine slaughtered this last year, and yet so many hogs left. Enormous paying off of farm mortgages has spoiled the old speeches of the calamity-howlers. If the ancients in their festivals presented their rejoicings before Ceres, the goddess of corn and tillage, shall we neglect to rejoice in the presence of the great God now?

"The rushing of the wheat through the great elevators."

From Atlantic to Pacific, let the American nation celebrate the victories of the plow. I come next to speak of the conquests of the American hammer. Its iron arm has fought its way down from the beginning to the present. Under its swing the city of Enoch rose, and the foundry of Tubal Cain sounded, and the ark floated on the deluge. At its clang, ancient temples spread their magnificence, and warriors rushed out fit for the battle. Its iron fist note the marble of Paros, and it rose in sculptured nervas, and struck the Pentelican mines, until from them a Parthenon was reared whiter than a palace of e and pure as an angel's dream. Damascus and Jerusalem, and Rome and Venice, and Paris and London, and Philadelphia and New York, and Washington, are at the long protracted echoes of the hammer. Under the hammer, everywhere dwellings have gone up, ornate and luxurious. Schoolhouses, lyceums, hospitals and asylums have added additional glory to the enterprise, as well as the beneficence of the American people. Last public works have been constructed, bridges have been built over rivers, and tunnels dug under mountains, and churches of matchless beauty have gone up for him who had not where to lay his head, and the old story is exploded that because Christ was born in a manger we must always worship him in a barn. Railroads of fabulous length have been completed, over which western trains rush past the swift-footed deer, making the frightened birds to dart into the heavens at the cough of the smoke-pipes and the savage yell of the steam whistle. In hot haste our national industry advances, her breath the air of ten thousand furnaces, her song the voice of uncounted factories, her footstep the flash of wheel-buckets, and the tread of the shaft and the stamp of foundries. Talk about antediluvian longevity. I think the average of human life is more now than it ever was. Through mechanical facilities men work so much faster and accomplish so much more in a lifetime that a man can afford to die now at forty years as well as one of old at 900. I think the average of human life in point of accomplishment is now equivalent to about 800 years, as near as I can calculate it. In all our occupations and professions we feel the effect of a crippled or enlarged mechanical enterprise. We all have stock in every house that is built, and in every public conveyance that is constructed, and in every ship that is sailed. When we see the hard-working men of the land living in comfortable abodes, with luxuries upon their table that once even kings could not afford, having the advantage of thorough education, of accomplishment and art, we are all ready this season to unite with them in praise to God for his goodness.

You shall yet see American labor rising up with a stronger arm and a stouter heart and a swarthier frame. New cities will be built. Commerce on the lakes will take new wings. Where now stand unbroken forests great capitals of business and affluence will rise, and dreams that have idled away six thousand years will be pressed to ponderous machinery and compelled to toil and sweat like the Chattahoochee and the Merrimac. At one of our great dry docks we shall yet build the model ocean steamship. It will come together under the chorus of a thousand American hammers. We shall start amid a great national hurrah, and move far out at sea as though an island had been unanchored with its forests of masts, or as if some one had said in scripture phrase unto a mountain, "Be thou cast into the sea." The volcano in her heart will sprinkle on the sea a baptism of fire, and as she goes up the channel of St. George, among the shipyards of the Old World, and among the wheels of Liverpool and Manchester shall be announced the skill and the glory of the American hammer.

Now I come to speak of the conquests of the pen. This is the symbol of all intellectuality. The painter's pencil and the sculptor's chisel and the philosopher's laboratory are all brothers to the pen, and therefore his may be used as a symbol of intellectual advancement. There are those disposed to decry everything American. Having seen Melrose and Glastonbury by moonlight, they never behold among us an impressive structure, or, having strolled through the picture galleries of the Louvre and the Luxemburg, they are disgusted with our academies of art. It makes me sick to hear these people who have been to Europe come home talking with a foreign accent, and aping foreign customs, and talking of moonlight on castles by the sea. I think the biggest fool in the country is the traveled fool.

But, considering the youth of our nation, and the fact that comparatively few persons devote themselves entirely to literature, I think we have great reason to thank God for the progress of our American literature. As historians have we not had in the past such men as Bancroft and Prescott; as essayists, Irving and Emerson; as jurists, Story and Marshall and Kent; as theologians, Edwards and Hodge; as poets, Pierpont and Sprague and Longfellow and Bryant; as sculptors, Powers and Crawford and Palmer; as painters, such men as West and Cole and Inman and Kensett? And among the living Americans, what galaxies of intellectual splendor and power! Edward Eggleston and Will Carleton, and Mark Twain, and John Kendrick Bangs, and Marion Harland, and Margaret Sangster, and Stockton, and Churchill, and Hopkinson Smith, and Irving Bacheller, and Julia Ward Howe, and Amelia Barr, and Brander Matthews, and Thomas Nelson Page, and Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and William Dean Howells, and a score of others; some of them fixed stars and some meteors.

As the pen has advanced our colleges and universities and observatories have followed the waving of its plume. Our literature is of two kinds—that on foot and that on the wing. By the former I mean the firm and substantial works which will go down through the centuries. When, on the other hand, I speak of literature on the wing, I mean the newspapers of the land. They fly swiftly and vanish, but leave permanent results upon the public mind. They fall noiselessly as a snowflake, but with the strength of an Alpine glacier. This unparalleled multiplication of intelligence will either make or break us. Every morning and evening our telegraph offices, with huge wire rakes, gather up the news of the nation and of the whole world, and men write to some purpose when they make a pen out of a thunderbolt.

It needs great energy and decision and perseverance for a man to be ignorant in this country to-day. It seems to me that it requires more effort for him to keep out knowledge than to let it in. The mail bags, at the smallest post offices, disgorge large packages of intelligence for the people. Academies with maps, globes and philosophic apparatus have been taking the places of those institutions where thirty or forty years ago you were put to the torture. Men selected for their qualifications are intrusted with the education of our youth, instead of those teachers who, formerly with a drover's shout and goad, compelled the young generations up the hill of science. Happy childhood! What with broken tops and torn kites, and the trial of losing the best marble, and stumping your foot against a stone, and some knowledge than in the four hundred thousand volumes of ancient Alexandria; and education is possible for the most indigent, and no legislature or Congress for the last fifty years has assembled which has not had in it rail-splitters and farmers and drovers, or men who have been accustomed to toiling with the hand and the foot.

The pen which Moses dipped in the light of the first morning, and Jeremiah filled with tears, and Ezekiel thrust in visions of fire, and Matthew touched with the blood of a cross, and St. John dipped in the splendors of beatific glory—that pen has wrought marvels for all classes of our people. To-day your libraries and colleges and schools and publishing houses, and churches celebrate the ever-growing conquests of the American pen, and our prospects are all the time growing brighter and brighter.

Who these many years hath turned back from our land the violent plagues which have swept with their train of terrors through other countries? Who hath grown in our fields harvests richer than Sicilian or Russian grain fields? Who hath lifted marsh after marsh, and built town after town, until every gleam on the wave of the lakes is answered by the gleam of city towers, and the roar of the ocean at one side of each harbor has been answered by the din of a great metropolis on the other—one hundred and sixty thousand miles of coal running side by side with one hundred and sixty thousand square miles of iron, the iron to pry out the coal, the coal to forge and smelt the iron? Make this calculation for yourselves, if you can make it; if England's coal-bed, thirty-two miles long by eight miles wide, can keep, as it does, seventeen million, six hundred thousand spindles at work in that small island, what may we not expect of our national industries when these one hundred and sixty thousand square miles of coal lands shall unite with the one hundred and sixty thousand square miles of iron, both stretching themselves up to their full strength and height—two world-shaking giants.

The grain fields have passed their harvests above the veto of drought and deluge. The freight cars are not large enough to bring down the grain to the seaboard. The canal boats are crowded with breadstuffs. Hark to the rushing of the wheat through the great Chicago corn "elevators!" Hark to the rolling of the hogheads of the Cincinnati pork-packers! Enough to eat, and at low prices. Enough to wear, and of home manufacture. If some have and some have not, then may God help those who have to hand over to those who have not! Clear the track for the rail-trains that rush on bringing the wheat, and the cotton, and the rice, and the barley, and the oats, and the hops, and the lumber, and the leather, and everything for man and everything for beast.

Lift up your eyes, O nation of God's right hand, at the glorious prospects! Build larger your barns for the harvests. Dig deeper the vats for the spoil of the vineyards. Enlarge the warehouses for the merchandise. Multiply galleries of art for the pictures and statues. Advance, O nation of God's right hand; but remember that national wealth, if unsanctified, is sumptuous waste, is moral ruin, is magnificent woe, is splendid rotteness, is gilded death. Woe to us for the wine vats, if drunkenness wallows in them! Woe to us for the harvests, if greed sickles them! Woe to us for the merchandise, if avarice swallows it! Woe to us for the cities, if misrule walks them! Woe to the land, if God-defying crime debauches it! Our only safety is in more Bibles, more churches, more free schools, more good men and more good women, more consecrated printing-presses, more of the glorious Gospel of the Son of God, which will yet extirpate all wrongs and introduce all blessedness.

But the preachers on Thanksgiving morning will not detain with long sermons their hearers from the home group. The housekeepers will be angry if the guests do not arrive until the viands are cold. Set the chairs to the table—the easy-chairs for grandfather and grandmother, if they be still alive; the high chair for the youngest, but not the least. Then put out your hand to take the full cup of thanksgiving; lift it, and bring it towards your lips, your hands trembling with emotion; and if the chalice shall overflow and trickle a few drops on the white cloth that covers the table, do not be disturbed, but let it suggest to you the words of the Psalmist, and lead you thankfully to say, "My cup runneth over!"

body sticking a pin into you to see whether you will jump, and examination day, with four or five wise men looking over their spectacles, to see if you can parse the first page in Young's Night Thoughts, until verbs and conjunctions and participles and prepositions get into a grand riot worthy of the Fourth Ward election day. What a schoolhouse that was in New Jersey, where some of us went! It was called "Herod's schoolhouse," because of its nearness to the residence of a man by the name of Herod; but it was doubly appropriate, because of the massacre of the innocents. In that schoolhouse we were compelled to sit upright, for eight hours—what an undertaking! And hours were longer then than now. We had various kinds of punishment in that school, too. One was to bend back the hand, smiting it with the ruler. Another was to strike the boy on the head, thus stimulating the brain. And another was to take the culprit over the schoolmaster's knee, so that information came to the boy from both directions.

How things have marvelously changed! We used to cry because we had to go to school. Now children cry if they cannot go. Many of them can intelligently discuss political topics long before they have seen a ballot box, or, teased by some poetic muse, can compose articles for the newspapers. Philosophy and astronomy and chemistry have been so improved that he must be a genius at dullness who knows nothing about them. On one shelf of a poor man's library is more practical

"I Have Called and Ye Have Refused" MOSES AND PHARAOH

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DEC. 8.
EXODUS 11: 1-10

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT:
THE ANGEL OF HIS PRESENCE SAVED THEM. ISA. 63: 9

Speak thou unto Pharaoh, King of Egypt, all that I say unto thee.

SUCH was the commission God gave to Moses. As credentials, he was empowered to do four miracles. Straightway he appeared at the court of Egypt, with his brother Aaron, whom God had appointed as his spokesman. Moses was eighty years old, and Aaron eighty-three, but they were young men for those times, in full vigor. In earlier years, Moses had, no doubt, dressed as an Egyptian of the household of Pharaoh, but forty years shepherding had changed his looks, so that when he stood before Pharaoh he probably was not recognized. Aaron, too, was rugged in appearance, his name indicating that he was a mountaineer.

But Rameses II. had passed away, and Menepthah I. reigned in his stead. The issue was clear-cut, and contained but one proposition. "Let my people go." The wall of determination not to do this was as adamant in the heart of the king. Moses was to be used as God's battering-ram to bring it low. First, came the miracles of the rod changed to a serpent, and the hand made leprous and swiftly healed. The wonders done by the magicians were not miracles at all, but mere feats of legerdemain similar to those which are common to this day among the jugglers of the East. In ancient mythology we read of Achilles, who was invulnerable, save at one point—his heel. His enemy, Paris, learned of this, and gave him a wound there that was mortal. Menepthah had one vulnerable point, and that was his religion, which deified nature, and counted every form of animal life an object of worship. His grandfather had offered two vases of wine to a frog as "the sovereign lady of both worlds." Menepthah worshiped the river god in the Nile; the soil, also, as the earth-god Seb; the sun as Ra; the atmosphere as Shu; the wind as Sutech. He worshiped, also, the god Apis, the sacred bull, and the scarab or sacred beetle. Once, twice, three times, four, five, six, seven times, eight, nine, ten times in the ten plagues it was necessary for God to wound him in his religion. The first attack was upon his river god, when its waters were turned into blood; the second, that of the frogs, was against the same god; the third, the lice, was against the earth god Seb; the fourth, that of flies—winged pests, was against Shu, the god of the atmosphere; the fifth, the murrain, was against the bull god Apis; the sixth, the boils, were against Typhon, the wind god; the seventh, the hail and fire, was against Shu; the eighth, the locusts, was against Scarab; the ninth, the darkness, was against the sun god Ra; the tenth, death of the first-born, was a just recompense for the killing of Hebrew children.

After each assault, Menepthah would send for Moses and say that he had determined to let the people go, and then he would change his mind, and bring on himself another judgment of God. While Menepthah's faith in his gods was being undermined, and the faith of all Egyptians as well, the faith of the Hebrews in their God was being strengthened, for two reasons. It was a battle between the true God of Israel and the false gods of Egypt, which fully proved that these so-called gods were but the creatures of Jehovah.

Picture the desolation of the scene at the end of the series of plagues; the banks of the sacred river foul and discolored; houses polluted and filled with foul odors of dead frogs; the fields stripped of every green thing; instead of animals grazing, dead carcasses lying about; trees thrown down and broken by wind and hail, and burned by lightning, and mourning in every Egyptian home because of the death of the first-born. Only in Goshen, where the Hebrews dwelt, these things were not so. The contrast made the desolation seem all the greater. It was like a foregleam of heaven and hell.

Illustration and Application

Like a panorama there passes before us the long line of prophets who have dared, as God's fearless ambassadors, to rebuke sin even in royal courts. After Rebuking Sin in High Places Moses before Pharaoh—say rather Pharaoh before Moses—comes King Saul before Samuel, David before Nathan, Ahab before Elijah, Belshazzar before Daniel, Pilate before Christ, Agrippa before Paul, and many a like scene in the newest Testament of modern history, as when John Knox, who "never feared the face of man," rebuked Mary Queen of Scots for her follies and sins. From West Africa comes a fresh story of a savage king rebuked by a Christian boy.

Agay when young was a slave, and used to carry salt from Akwamu to Kumasi. His master was a head chief of a town or village. One day he was summoned to Kumasi to appear before the king. But the charge against him was false and cruel.

Agay went with his cast-down master. After the king's officials had represented the matter to their monarch, and when judgment was about to be given to the prisoner, Agay bravely spoke up for his innocent master. He addressed the king of all Ashanti as follows:

"King! you have men to wake you, wash you, dress you; you have men to cook your food, light your pipe, carry your stool; men to fight for you, flatter you, and do anything you please, except that you have no one to speak the truth and tell you when God does not like your palaver."

His head was cried for. The people who stood around feared the worst things would happen to the boy for this bold and daring interruption. But the king said, "No! let him finish." He spoke so earnestly, and argued so forcefully about the innocence of his master, that the king not only acquitted him, but kept the boy in his service.

Soon after he again pleaded a case so justly and impressively that the king promoted this boy, who had "dared to be a Daniel," somewhat as Daniel of old was honored. Agay continued to distinguish himself, and eventually became the king's chief linguist, adviser and minister, greatly honored by king and people alike.

The cause of Christ suffers so much from lack of courage that the fearlessness of faith as seen in Moses before Pharaoh needs to be dwelt upon. Many a Christian who fails to do right when not his life, but only his living is in jeopardy, may well learn from the pagan. Pompey was warned against the danger of his returning from Egypt to Italy to meet a new trouble in his own land, but his heroic answer was: "It is a small matter that I should move forward and die. It is too great a matter that I should take one step backward and against God. Worse than the changing of water to blood was the changing of his heart to stone. Volumes have been written to explain the statement that God hardened Pharaoh's heart (Ex. 11: 10). A Hebrew rabbi, Dr. Herm Baar, explained it thus in a Hebrew orphanage: "If a sensible child is corrected, nay, even punished for its wrongdoings, it heeds and remembers the punishment, and usually tries to avoid it in the future by showing remarkable signs of great improvement. Quite different is it with a stubborn child; the more it is reproved and punished, the more yielding and hardened it often becomes." The explanation is partly in the passage already quoted, that Pharaoh hardened his own heart (Ex. 4: 21). The case is like that of Job, who in losses that Satan was allowed to bring on him said, "The Lord hath taken away." Pharaoh was the Satan in the case before us, and his own heart his victim. In the exercise of free choice, without which one could be only irresponsible machine, he rejected the very miracles that had softened Moses' heart and aroused it to duty, as a would-be suicide might use the same wind that carried another to harbor to dash his own upon the rocks. Job's case also explains the passages about Pharaoh being raised up to divine power might be shown upon him (Ex. 9: 16; 11: Rom. 9: 15-18). As God allowed Satan to deal with Job he did, knowing the result would be a lesson to the world. God used the free acts of Pharaoh for a like purpose. Let us not debate too long about Pharaoh's "hard heart," but look to our own.

For us, as for Pharaoh, free will holds the helm to make what God gave to be means of life unto life, a means of death unto death. "Thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God? Or despise thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? But after thy hardness and impenitent heart, treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath, revelation of the righteous judgment of God?" Pharaoh's case was one of "golden hardening." A boy of twelve to-day in many cases has heard the invitation to come to Jesus in church and Sunday School oftener than his grandfather, the days of circuit riders and monthly seasons, heard it in a lifetime. Very early in life the heart may be hardened like a highway by rejected invitations. "To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts." Your heart is not yet dead, there is left in it any fear lest it be already hardened, hardened beyond the power of the promise, "I will take away the stone of your heart, and I will give you a heart of flesh."

One ship drives east, and another drives west
With the self-same winds that blow,
'Tis the set of sails and not the gales,
Which tell us the way to go.

Like the waves of the sea are the ways of fate
As we voyage along thro' life,
'Tis the set of the soul which decides its goal
And not the calm or strife.

—ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

Pharaoh is like many of us in his prolonged efforts to induce God to accept something less than full obedience and complete submission. On God's first miraculous call, he turned his back. At his second judgment, he promised to let go of what God bade him give up—"to-morrow"—how like the sinner of to-day! After two more judgments, he said Israel might go—but not far away. He would keep his sin near enough to resume it, like many who repent but fail to "burn their bridges" against a return to their sins. After the ninth judgment call, he said the men might go, but not the women and children. He knew the men would be soon back in such case. A little later, he said all the people might go, but not their flocks. He knew the wilderness, and counted on hunger to restore his slaves. Only when death spoke in his own house God's command did he make full submission to the King of kings and say "Go all of you and all that you have." Only on this full submission did God's judgments cease, and when that was presently taken back by his stubborn will and he pursued the Israelites to the Red Sea, there came on him and his people what might be called the eleventh plague, the most destructive of all, the drowning of his army, perhaps of himself also. There is an awful warning in this story for us all against a partial consecration. Ananias and Sapphira brought a like judgment on themselves for a like cause. "We can serve God without condemnation only when we serve him without reservation." In the Old Testament God's judgments were often inflicted in this world. But it is not for us to interpret every flood and fire as a judgment of God, and

Deal damnation round the land
On each we deem His foe.

Because, in the punishment of individuals he does not always "pay by the day," let us not suppose that word shall fail, "The wicked shall not go unpunished." Let us then waste no time in dribbling out our consecration, consenting to serve God in home and church, but only with mental reservations in business and politics and pleasure.

"THERE WAS A GREAT CRY IN EGYPT" live." There is no safer place than the post of duty. When soldiers were dodging as they heard the bullets whiz by, the general shouted: "Stop that, you'll dodge right into the way of the bullet." In the path of duty "man is immortal till his work is done."

But while Moses and Aaron were safe in seeming peril, Pharaoh and his first-born and his property and his people were in danger, though in seeming security.

Disobedience Death came not to those who fearlessly did their duty, but to the disobedient. Pharaoh's sceptre he had himself turned into a serpent.

Brings like many other wicked kings. Every Israelite killed by "the slaughter of the innocents" and by overwork was avenged by Him who has said for all ages, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." The innocent suffered in the households of the guilty, as they always do. When any man sins he endangers his first-born and all his family by heredity or example or otherwise. If sin were done when 'tis done it would not be so serious a matter, but science and history, as well as Scripture, tell us that those that hate God curse their children's children "to the third and fourth generation."

The worst death, however, in this lesson is the eternal death of Pharaoh, which occurred while he was yet alive, when he "hardened his heart" in wilful, persistent rebellion

The Needle's Eye

A NEW SERIAL STORY WRITTEN EXPRESSLY

Chapter I.—A Wintry Dawning

ABOVE, blazed myriad stars set close in a heaven of infinite darkness; below, shone the dimly luminous face of earth, piled high with fresh-fallen snow. Betwixt the two a bitter wind whined fitfully, the snow leaping up in misty swirls to greet it, only to sink again in fantastic ripples and curiously wrought rests in fence-corners and hollows.

Erastus Winch emerged from his house into this mystery of cold and night, and stood for an instant, taring about him with the blank, unseeing eyes of one awfully aroused from sleep. The wind hurled itself upon his heavy, stoop-shouldered figure, tearing savagely at his garments, which became on the instant all white and sparkling with the transfiguring now crystals. He raised his smoky lantern that he might consult the black-vised thermometer, which rattled unasily on its rusty nail beside the door. "Five below!" he ejaculated, scowling at the unoffending register of temperature. "Humph!"

The immediate result of his subsequent cogitations appeared in a brisk opening of the closed door. "'Liz'beth! I say, 'Liz'beth! Be ye goin' to stay abed all day? It's more'n four o'clock a-ready, ye'd ought to have yer fire a-roarin' by this time. Consarn it! I didn't I tell ye yiste'day I was goin' to fill to-day?"

The sound of stove-lids and poker in active co-operation appearing sufficient answer to this harangue, the door clapped to a second time, and without further pause the man plunged into the drifted path leading to the barn, which loomed huge and black amid the spectral whiteness of the surroundings. As he opened the door—with difficulty—because of the clogging snow, a mingled odor of hay and feed, of steaming bodies of cattle and horses, of harnesses and wagons, grease-be-smear'd; of huddled fowls, of nests and haunts of swallows, rats and mice—an odor indescribable and not to be mistaken—in a word, the smell of a barn, as tightly closed as possible against wind and cold, rushed out like an invisible presence to greet him.

Erastus Winch loved this smell, though he was doubtless unaware of the fact; it was the pleasantly suggestive odor of "prop'ty"—as he was wont to term his material possessions. With the odor came sounds, also indicative of the presence of "prop'ty." There was a subdued but expectant stirring in the darkness, a noise of shuffling roofs, of deep-chested breathing, of heavy bodies rubbing uneasily against frosty stalls, of grunting and squealing from the pen of the condemned swine, the quick flutter of wings, and the shrill note of the cock challenging the familiar twinkle of the smoky lantern. Pleasant sounds every one, and welcome to the ear of the farmer, as the "All's well!" to the sailor on board his flying vessel, or the long-drawn call of the muezzin to the inhabitant of an Eastern city.

The master of the barn responded to these tokens of fealty from his dumb slaves after the manner of his kind. "Whoa, thar!" he bawled loudly, as he set down his lantern on a convenient barrel. "Ha'n't ye got no more sense 'an to tear yer insides out, ye tarsal critters?"

There being manifestly no possible answer to this inquiry, the man proceeded to his task of forking down hay into the mangers, of measuring grain and chopping turnips for the hungry cattle. In the midst of these operations another sound smote upon his ears, a sound which caused the heaped measure to drop from his shaking fingers. It was unmistakably the cry of a young infant. It seemed to arise from the black depths of the haymow.

Now if there be anything on earth more helpless or more harmless than the young of the human species, it is yet to be found. Perhaps because of this, a baby's cry shakes the soul of a man and wrings the heart of a woman. Erastus Winch had heard this sound once before on a winter's morning—a single cry, then silence. Whether he would or no, in the stillness that followed this singular interruption of his labors, he lived over again the hour which saw his first-born and only child breathe and wail—once.

He frowned as he refilled the measure. "I hope I ain't fallin' into the ways of them fool spiritoolists," he muttered. Enlivened by the humor of this conceit, he called loudly upon the poultry to approach and be fed. Sounds of satisfaction, of greed, of anxiety, of anger arose here and there from feathered throats. Into the midst of the clamor struck again that other sound, faint, yet insistent, the cry of the helpless human atom having relinquished an earthly crown, passes on into kingdoms eternal.

The woman was dead—this much was evident even to the dull perceptions of Erastus Winch. He stared at the still loveliness of the white face unwinkingly. "What—what—" he muttered, stammering thickly in his bewilderment. Then he stooped to draw aside the folds of a heavy cloak which concealed something that had hitherto escaped his notice. The something stirred feebly, and for the third time sent forth its piteous appeal for human aid.

"'Liz'beth! 'Liz'beth!"

The woman turned quickly from the hot stove where she was superintending the frying of the matutinal pork. She recognized in the tones the familiar appeal of masculine inability to feminine efficiency. "Wall, 'Rastus," she said resignedly, "what's happened now?"

"What's happened?" repeated the man, stamping the snow off his cowhide boots with vicious emphasis. "You kin well ask! Say! how many tarnation times hev I got to tell ye to lock the door to the barn? You must ha' left it open agin las' night when you fed the calves, an' a tramp's got in thar an' died."

"You don't say!" The woman's hands were uplifted, sympathy and horror dawned in her dim eyes. "In the barn! An' we asleep an' warm in our bed! Why didn't the poor fellow come to the house; he could ha' slep' by the kitchen stove 's well as not."

"Not much he couldn't," growled her husband, unwinding the woolen comforter from about his neck. "'T ain't a man, anyhow; it's a woman, an' thar's a baby.—Come now, ye don't need to fly off the handle like that, if 'tain't dead a-ready 'twill be time you see it. I want my breakfast first thing, d' ye hear?"

The woman had snatched up the lantern, and, casting the skirt of her calico gown over her head in feeble defiance of the storm, was already out of hearing.

"Women are such consarned fools!" soliloquized Erastus Winch, regarding the frying-pan sourly. "Pork a-burhin', an' everythin' goin' to thunder, an' don't keer, ef thar's a baby in a hundred miles of em!"

He clumsily removed the smoking utensil from its position over the blazing sticks, spattering his hands with the boiling fat as he did so, a circumstance which by no means soothed his already ruffled temper. After which he followed his wife in her hasty flight to the scene of the tragedy, communing with himself as he went concerning the unforeseen circumstance which threatened to upset his plans anent the inmates of the pig-sty.

Elizabeth Winch had found her way to the side of the dead woman, where, first wrapping the baby in warm arms of compassion, she stood gazing into the white purity of the sleeping face.

"Lord save us!" she was murmuring to herself, "Now did you ever! Poor thing—an' we asleep an' warm in our bed."

"'Twa'n't our fault," said her husband, sulkily eyeing the dead woman, whom he conceived on the instant to be the cause of his smarting fingers as well as of his disordered plans. "S'pose I'll hev to hitch up fust thing an' git the corner up here," he continued, with rising irritation. "What bizness had the likes of her to come sneakin' 'bout other folk's prop'ty—and the poor-house not a mile further on! The Lord knows I pay taxes 'nough to git quit of paupers, dead or 'live!"

"Now, 'Rastus," protested his wife, "prob'ly the poor critter couldn't walk another step. But, land! I musn't stan' here; she's stun dead, that's plain; but this 'ere baby's as live as a cricket—poor lamb!"

"That young 'un's a-goin' to the poor-house, soon's I c'n git my breakfas' an' hitch," quoth the man loudly. But Elizabeth, being a thin, agile woman, was again out of hearing.

LYING ON THE HAY AT HIS FEET WAS THE FORM OF A WOMAN

newly arrived out of eternity. The man seized his lantern and strode determinedly toward the haymow. "I ain't no fool!" he strenuously assured himself. "If thar's anythin' in that thar hay 'sides fodder, I'll find it, or my name ain't Winch."

There was something. Having found it, he stood stark still for a full minute at a loss for words of sufficient significance to express his wonder. What he saw by the light of the lantern was solemn enough and mysterious enough and sad enough to have melted a heart of stone. Lying on the hay at his feet was the form of a woman. This much he saw at a glance; then his amazed eyes told him more. This motionless figure was not huddled frowsily together, after the manner of homeless vagabonds who take refuge from the storm and cold in the first rude shelter that offers; it lay upon its rude couch in the majestic attitude of a queen, who,

He repeated his words with added emphasis half an hour later. The two had partaken of their meal in haste and silence, the woman casting an occasional glance toward the wooden rocking-chair, where, warmly covered, the waif slept quietly.

Erastus Winch had followed these glances with frowning eyes. Now he pushed back his chair with a loud, scraping sound, and deliberately wiped his mouth upon the back of his hand. This was the familiar signal for a prompt renewal of the grinding labor, which made up their daily lives. Elizabeth was wont to respond by springing at once from her chair and instituting a vigorous attack upon the breakfast dishes. This morning she sat still in her place; her eyes, as she lifted them to her husband's face, shone with an unaccustomed light.

"Rastus," she began timidly, "I wish—that is, I've been a-thinkin' that—"

"Yas!" broke in the man, noisily ruminating the departing flavors of his recent meal; "I know what you've been a-thinkin' well 'nough. You want I should 'low ye to keep that thar young 'un; but I ain't a-goin' to do it. It'll start fur the poor-house in jes' ten minits f'om now. I'll stop to Dundor's on the way back, an' he'll see to gittin' the corpse away."

He paused with his hand upon the latch, and fixed his greenish eyes full upon the woman. "An' I'll tell ye 'nother thing I ain't a-goin' to hev neither—an' you'd better pay 'tention to what I tell ye. I ain't a-goin' to hev all the women-folk in this 'ere neighborhood a trappin' through this house an' runnin' all over my barn, peekin' an' pryin' an' clackin'. Don't ye tell nobody what's up. Time nough fur gabbin' when the hull thing's out the way. That's my way of tendin' to bizness, an' its been my way fur more 'n forty years back. I'm going out to hitch up the critters now; whilst I'm gone you c'n git the water a-bilin'. I'm goin' to kill them hogs jes' 's I said, if we be late. Consarn the tramp anyhow!"

Elizabeth had not stirred from her chair during this harangue. Her husband suddenly became aware of this. "What you settin' thar for?" he demanded. "Looks like you was waitin' fur kingdom come. I hain't no time to fool away, I tell ye!"

"Rastus Winch," said the woman slowly, "I'm a-goin' to keep that baby."

"You're a-goin' to keep that baby—eh?"

"Yes, I be. The Lord ain't never givin' me none of my own, 'xcept—" Her voice broke, and she raised her apron to her eyes.

Erastus Winch set his back against the door; his grim face hardened. "You ain't no call to bring that up," he said harshly. "The Lord's done by ye 'cordin' to his will. Ye ain't got no children 'cause he don't want ye to have none."

"He's give me this one. I'm a-goin' to keep it!"

"Wall now, I say ye ain't, an' I'm the one to say, I guess!" Why, consarn it, hain't ye got 'nough to occ'py yer time? Thar's the cows a-comin' in afore long—thar'll be a dozen or more calves to look arter. An' hens, an' turkeys, an' geese to set, an' chicks an' goslin' to feed; an' all the while the milk to take keer of an' butter to make. Ye ain't a-goin' to tie yer han's with no beggar brat, if I know it. 'Sides, we can't 'ford it. He'd eat his blamed head off in no time!"

Elizabeth Winch arose from her chair. She was a tall, angular woman, whose dress, complexion and hair had long since acquired the hopeless tints of her surroundings.

But the eyes in the faded face shone suddenly bright and clear, and the voice rang out in the forgotten tones of youth. "Rastus!" she cried, "you say the Lord ain't give me no children 'cause he don't want me to have none. Then why did he give me sech a hanker-in' after 'em? He doos want me to have 'em, an' he meant I should have 'em!"

"Why ain't you got 'em then?" sneered the man, repenting the words as they escaped his lips in the light of the answering flash from the eyes of the woman.

"You don't need to ask that question," she answered bitterly. "If I'd ha' had half the care you give the milk critturs mebber—but thar ain't no use talkin' 'bout it.

That's my baby in the cheer yonder, an' he ain't agoin' to the poor farm this day ner any other day."

The man shifted uneasily from one foot to the other, then he burst out in loud, blustering tones, "Whose house is this, anyhow? Ain't it mine? Say, ain't I a right to tell what I'll hev an' what I won't hev in my own house? Consarn it! What d' ye mean by talkin' that much, husband. I kin do more fur you ef I have him."

"Now, 'Liz'beth, you're a-talkin' what ain't good hors sense," said the man, tugging argumentatively at the short tuft of gray whiskers which depended from his chin. "An' what's more, you know you be. You don't want that boy any more'n a cat wants two tails; an' I'm blamed sure I don't; so that's settled." He turned momentarily as he spoke and laid his hand once more upon the latch. "I'm a-goin' to hitch now. I'll stop at th' door fur the young 'un, an' mind you don't hender me with no more o' your tarnal nonsense." He slammed the door heavily behind him.

Elizabeth dropped on her knees beside the rocking-chair, her thin shoulders shaking with suppressed sobs. "My baby," she whispered "my baby—mine—mine."

When, ten minutes later, the frost jingle of bells and harness apprised her of the fact that the "hitchin'" up had been accomplished, she opened the door, closed it carefully behind her and stood waiting ankle deep in the unswept snow.

Her husband eyed her sourly as he pulled up his horses. "Hand out," he commanded briefly.

"I've got somethin' to say to you 'Rastus."

"Wall!"

"If you take that baby away from me, 'Rastus Winch, I'll never fee another chicken; I'll never look at another calf; I'll never cook you another meal of victuals, nor lift finger in your house agin as long as I live. So help me God!" The woman's face was pinched and colorless, but solemn determination was written in every line of it.

The man's jaw fell; he thrust one leg tentatively out of the sleigh, then slowly pulled it in again, and mechanically drew the blankets close about his knees. "You're a durned sight bigger fool 'an I took ye fur 'Liz'beth," he said, with a rasping cough. "You'll be mighty sorry for this afore you're through!" With that he curled his lash with vicious emphasis about the flanks of his shivering horses and disappeared in a cloud of glittering snow dust, which smote the woman's white face like needles.

"I'll never be sorry for it!" she cried exultantly. She laughed aloud in the face of the rising sun. Long shafts of pink and yellow splendor streamed across the dazzling blue white of the fields, transfiguring the haggard figure with the celestial tints of morning. From the gnarled orchard closes sounded the gay carol of a chickadee; sparrows called shrilly from their rugged nests under the eaves. The woman stared about her with wide eyes, her starved soul swelling in her shriveled breast.

Then the thought of the dead woman seized her like a threatening hand. "I must look," she muttered. "There'll be a letter, mebber—or a name. Somebody 'll take him away from me!"

There was no letter, no name, no sign—even on the worn clothing in which the unknown was clad. Elizabeth satisfied herself of this. A sweet-smiling mystery, flower-pure, snow-clad, the dead mother vouchsafed no answer to the burning questions in the eyes of the living mother who bent over her. She reverently touched one of the waxen hands. "I ain't like you," she whispered. "but I'll love him an' take keer of him faithful as long 's I live!"

Then she uttered a short, sharp cry. There was something after all, lying on the hay and half covered by one exquisite palm. Elizabeth drew this object toward her with shaking fingers, and, wrapping it in her apron, fled toward the house.

In the rosy light of the new day, which streamed in at the kitchen window, she examined what she had found. It was a book—a Bible, bound in shabby, russet-colored leather. On the fly-leaf something was written in a delicate hand. To Elizabeth's unaccustomed eyes it seemed almost illegible. She spelled it out word by word: "The stretching forth of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel!" Below this were two other words written in bolder characters. She stared at them intently, but the strangely twisted letters conveyed no meaning to her brain.

"It's a name, mebber," she muttered. "I—I'll keep it keeful for him."

Elizabeth walked swiftly to the side of the rocking-chair. She laid her work-distorted fingers lightly, caressingly on the soft-heaving wrappings which betrayed, chrysalis-like, the life pulsing within. WEIGHING AN INVISIBLE GAS

THE "PURIFYING POWER"

CHANGE FROM INVISIBLE GAS TO SOLID

CHRIST'S BLOOD AND MAN'S HEART

Unique "Chemical Talks" on Religion by Mr. T. S. Gladding at the Bowery Mission

MR. THOMAS S. GLADDING, President of the Y. M. C. A., Montclair, N. J., has recently become one of the most active workers in connection with the Bowery Mission. The circumstances under which Mr. Gladding associated himself with this work were very touching. Four years ago he was ereft by death of his son, Willard Gladding, a bright, promising boy. Mr. and Mrs. Gladding felt the bereavement very keenly, but bore it in a spirit of resignation. More than ever interested in young men, and especially those who had been neighbors and companions of their son, they built, at their own expense, the splendid gymnasium, which is attached to the new building of the Montclair Y. M. C. A. It is a most beautiful and complete gymnasium and exists as a memorial to the youth whose life came to such a sudden close four years ago. In the spring of this year Mr. Gladding suffered another, and an even deeper sorrow, in the death of his wife. The morning after she died he met the superintendent of the Bowery Mission. He and his wife had always been deeply interested in the Mission's work. Often had they visited the hall, and never without doing kind and efficient work among the destitute and friendless men who throng to its meetings. To the superintendent Mr. Gladding declared his intention of seeking consolation in earnest Christian service among these poor and homeless. Several conferences were held, and, after carefully studying the needs of the work, Mr. Gladding voluntarily decided upon giving up his beautiful residence in Montclair, N. J., and establishing a Christian home in the neighborhood of the Mission, where young converts, who are now living in Bowery lodging-houses, and liable to the fiercest temptations and most degrading kind of associations, might find an abode with moral influences and surroundings. A suitable building has been purchased by Mr. Gladding, and is now being furnished. It will shortly be opened, when the work will begin in earnest. Meantime he has been rendering excellent service in the meetings at the Bowery Mission. Every alternate Sunday evening he is the appointed speaker.

It is, however, in the Young Men's Weekly Meeting that Mr. Gladding's services have been in greatest request. As a member of one of the most prominent firms of analytical chemists in the city, he is a recognized scientific authority. Three recent addresses he has delivered on spiritual subjects, illustrated by chemical experiments, have awakened the interest of the young men to an unusual degree. As Mr. Gladding stands at his table, with his jars and balances and other paraphernalia in front of him, or as he picks them up in rapid succession and uses them, never for a moment does the interest flag; and when the spiritual truth is driven home in a lovingly, earnest and eloquent manner, it is easy to see how convincing and effective this method of preaching the Gospel is.

The first of the three addresses, had for its subject "God's Power to Transform for Good." This was illustrated in many ways, such as sodium and muriatic acid; in themselves corrosive and destructive substances, yet changed in combination into the useful and necessary article of table salt. Carbon, the commonest of all materials upon which human life subsists, which can be transformed into the flashing diamond, serves for many most interesting and striking experiments. The second address was on "The Reality of Invisible Things," illustrated by the dissolving of common objects, such as sugar or salt, in water, yet in their invisible state being as real and as necessary as when seen. Carbonic acid gas, invisible yet real; a candle plunged into a bottle filled with this gas becoming immediately extinguished. Several very delicate experiments were made on this subject, requiring the use of the most finely adjusted scales, showing that this invisible gas had both weight and power.

The third address was on "God's Power to Save and Keep." A jar of pure water represented man in a state of innocence. Another jar of an equally fine looking liquid represented the power of evil, for does not the devil come as an angel of light? A few drops of this innocent-looking liquid dropped into the good-man bottle, and in an instant the contents are as black as ink. How is this to be remedied? Not by good works, for pour as much pure water over the bottle as you will, no difference is perceptible. But the cover is taken from a larger vessel filled with a crimson liquid, representing the blood of Christ. Some of this precious blood is poured into the black and poisoned fluid, and in an instant it is pure again. It is of no avail to pour the crimson flood over the tainted bottle, if the stopper is not taken out. No change comes even if you plunge the corked bottle into the crimson cistern. The man must open his heart and take Christ in. Such were some of the truths driven forcibly home by illustrations so striking as to produce instant conviction in many young minds. These "chemical talks" will be given by Mr. Gladding frequently during the winter months, and our readers are asked to pray that they may be made a means of blessing. J.G.H.

The Red Man's Thanksgiving

IN wagons and buggies, the old red-skins came over the plains toward Chilocco. They were headed toward the beautiful white stone structures which stood out in relief against the approaching darkness. In all, there must have been a hundred wagons, as many buggies, and twice that number of horseback riders, who arrived at Chilocco Indian schools on the night before Thanksgiving. These schools are just south of the Kansas border, on the line of the Santa Fe Railroad, and are considered to be the best Indian schools in the United States, except Carlisle. There are many hundreds of pupils, who are advanced rapidly under Prof. Goodman. At nightfall, praise service is held on the lawn, and the full-bloods, whose children are attending the school, hear, perhaps for the first time, an appeal to the Deity.

On Thanksgiving Day, the baseball and football teams, composed of big husky giants, contest in games, while the old people gather around and watch the strange sport. Young women play basket ball before the eyes of their astonished mothers. At evening, a service is held in the large chapel, where the young orators burst forth in their eloquence, and the young women strain their musical ability to the utmost. The old folks, whose ears are not trained to such noises, sit in mute wonder; but they are being taught a lesson.

These meetings at Chilocco on Thanksgiving have been arranged for the good of the old people. They are not allowed to visit their children at all times, but on Thanksgiving Day the teachers offer them this opportunity. It is a strangely happy lot of redskins that gathers on the school grounds. While those pagans of the old school do not give thanks for anything, because they have been taught no better, they see their children in a civilized community, and it helps and comforts them. In all the tepees, there has been for years grumbling against the taking away of the Indian child to attend school. These gatherings please the old folks greatly, and are rapidly teaching them that there is something specially agreeable associated with Thanksgiving Day.

Thanksgiving Thoughts

AMONG the things to be grateful for are improved municipal and national conditions. We do not suppose that New York was any worse than other cities, but its opportunities of theft were larger! It stole more because it had more to steal. We suppose that if they had the same opportunities, if there had been the same largeness of spoils in Boston, Philadelphia, Charleston and New Orleans, the political cormorants would not have stopped short of the same magnitude of outrage. The prominent offenders were not worse than hundreds of political corruptionists. They were smarter, and they knew how to clutch a million when the stupid fellows knew only how to clutch the thousands. But never since God corrected the politics of Sodom by burying the city in brimstone, were there greater outrages enacted on earth than in some of our cities, under the disguise of municipal government; frauds about parks, about pavements, about station-houses, about pipes, about city halls, about aqueducts, about courts, about accounts, about elections; frauds about everything. Fraudulent men applied for contracts to fraudulent officials, who wrote contracts upon paper they had stolen, and then went home over pavements, every stone of which had been put down in dishonesty, and in carriages, every spoke and rivet of which were evidences of their crime. Fraudulent election inspectors sat around fraudulent ballot-boxes, and took fraudulent votes, and made fraudulent returns, and sent to our State legislatures, men fit only for the idiot asylum or the penitentiary.

Things went on until the decent people in all our cities for years were under the very saddest depression. The newspapers did not dare to speak out for fear they would lose the public printing; the pulpits did not dare to speak out because there were prominent men in the churches who had one hand on the spoils and the other hand at the throat of the clergy, telling them they had better be prudent and keep quiet. Matters were beyond all human redemption; and no statesmanship, no skill, no human wisdom would ever have met the crisis; but the Lord God Almighty rose up, and he put it into the hearts of the best men of both parties to band together and lay their hands to the work. The monstrosities were exposed, the vagabonds of fraud were arrested, the moral sentiment in all the cities was roused up. Although the work has only fairly begun, the prospects are brightening, and all the cities in this land will yet be redeemed. It is time, I think, for tax gatherers and reformers, and Christian men, to assemble in the churches with thanksgiving to God for the deliverances effected, and the deliverances that are to come; and to remember that while honest men may be the instrumentalities, the Lord alone can save the city. Oh, when we look off upon the wreck of routed office-holders, when we see to-day men whose names only a little while ago made cities stand in awe, now playing hide and seek with sheriffs and constables, when we see the patronage of our great cities going out of the hands of the abandoned and miserable into the hands of men whose integrity cannot be questioned, we feel that we must clap the cymbals of triumph, as did Miriam, on the banks of the Red Sea, and cry out, "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously, the horse and the rider hath he thrown into the sea."

Furthermore: We have cause for gratitude that our nation is in more perfect peace than ever before. The Spanish War nearly put down sectionalism, but the assassination of our late President brought all sections into expressions of sympathy that positively obliterated the last difference between the North and the South. We were for a great many years under the delusion that we were at peace in this country; but there never has been any peace until within a few years. It was war of pen and war of speech. Look at the Congressional Record of 1830, was that peace? The Congressional Record of 1837, of 1846, of 1857, of 1860. Was that peace? No! Because of the inimical nature of the interests of the North and the South, many of us remember there was perpetual collision. It was free-trade men against tariff men; it was free labor against slave labor; it was Massachusetts against South Carolina; it was New York against Virginia representation. It was Charleston Mercury against Albany Journal. Challenge, altercation, and duel all over the land. Even at the time that Brooks was cudgelling Sumner, and Potter thrashing Pryor, and chains were stretched around Boston Court House to keep fugitives from escaping from the hands of the marshal, and all our northern cities were in riot and bloodshed about the relation of black men to their owners, we were under the delusion that we were at peace. Monstrous absurdity! It was war perpetual. Pennsylvania Hall burned on account of this political agitation in the city of Philadelphia; was that peace? The printing press of the Alton Observer thrown into the river; was that peace? In 1820, when the air was hot with sectional imprecation about the admission of Missouri as a slave State—was that peace? The burning of a college in New Hampshire, in 1835, because colored youth were admitted—was that peace? The Presbyterian and the Methodist Churches, North and South, split with a fracture that shook all Christendom on account of political agitation—was that peace? No! All Billingsgate, and scum, and vituperation, and hatred, and revenge and blasphemy on both sides were exhausted. It was war of tongue, war of pen, war of trade, war of church—war! bitter, furious, consuming, relentless.

Thank God, that time has gone by. We have come to a new state of feeling—a brotherhood such as we have never enjoyed. And our Congress, instead of spending nine-tenths of its time, wasting the public treasury in discussing sectional difficulties, as it used to do, will give nine-tenths of its time to the discussions of the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing, the commercial, the literary, and the moral interests of this nation.

Are we not to be thankful to God for this state of feeling? He hath not dealt so with any other nation. Praise him, all ye people.

Unanswered Letters

RECENTLY I received a letter from a stranger in Nebraska, saying that he had bought a large tract of land and had got in trouble about it, and he wanted me to loan or give him $15,000. I told my wife to send him the $15,000 right away, but as she did not happen to have that money about her, the probability is, it was not sent. I received a letter from a young man, saying, he would get married if I would send him money enough to pay for his wedding trip. A man in New England wants to become a lecturer, and wont I write him two or three lectures. Two letters from people who are desperate, and if I do not send them relief they will commit suicide. A man writes me for my autograph enclosing a postage stamp. Not getting an answer, he writes me to be honest enough to send back the postage stamp. Getting no answer to that he writes me: "You scoundrel, you stand there and preach the Gospel, and yet dare cheat a man out of a postage stamp." Letters through the Post Office are handed in at my door and left for me at the door of churches, until my pockets are full and my tables are full and the shelves are full and the closets are full, and one of my ideas of the loveliness of heaven is that there will be no morning and evening mail. I have piles of letters of good advice telling me how to preach and how not to preach, and the poorer the syntax and etymology, the more urgent the counsel. Letters discussing theological points, spelling the word God with a small "g." Multitudes of welcome letters of encouragement, which are to me perpetual and everlasting help, and which go into the very fibre of my immortal nature, and through all eternity I will thank God that I read them. I say these things to excuse myself for seeming unfaithfulness in postal correspondence.

The Sword Sheathed

ALTHOUGH in many parts of the world international relations are unsatisfactory, the world is talking more of arbitration, and the putting of the sword back in the scabbard than ever before.

The time will come when any nation proposing war will be prohibited, by all other nations making protest.

The time will come when arbitration will entirely supersede gunpowder and keen steel. So long as the time of William Penn the efficacy of arbitration was demonstrated. He proposed to come America, and, without any weapons, treat with the worst savages. Charles II scoffed at him, and said "What? Venture yourselves among the savages North America? Why, man, what security have you that you will not be in their war kettle within two hours after setting your foot on their shores?" "The best security in the world," said William Penn. "I doubt that, Friend William," said the king; "I have no idea of any security against those American cannibals but a regiment of good soldiers with their bayonets, muskets, and, I tell you beforehand, with all my good will for you and your family, to whom I am under obligations, I will not send a single soldier with you." "I want none of your soldiers," said William Penn; "depend upon something better." "On what?" asked the king. William Penn answered: "On the Indians themselves, on their moral sense and on the protection of God. It is a fact in American history, that for seventy years the red men kept that treaty, and it was not broken until the white men broke it. A venerable general of the United States Army, who had fought more battles for our Government and against the Indians than any other man, told me that, in all the Indian wars, to his personal knowledge, the white men were the more to blame. Now, if the treaty made between William Penn and the American savages could last seventy years, certainly intelligent nations ought to be able to keep the peace. In most wars, the question at issue was undecided after as before bloodshed. In our war with Great Britain in 1812, the question involved was the impressment of American seamen. Two years after a half the war raged. Our Government expended three hundred million dollars and lost thousands of lives, and the question still remained unsettled about the impressment of American sailors. Some say war is necessary, to clear off the superfluous population of the earth, and that had it not been for the hundreds of millions slain in battle, the earth would have been too crowded with inhabitants. But our opinion is that people die fast enough. What with the cholera and the yellow fevers, and the cyclones and the shipwreck and the earthquakes, depopulation needs not be accelerated. The best thing you can do with a man is to save him, and the worst thing you can do with a man is to kill him.

An Old-Time Thanksgiving

WHEN the boys came home for Thanksgiving, what a gala time we had, and what hearty welcomes were given, as the big lumbering stage-coach rolled up and deposited its precious load at the front gate. The chief event was the dinner; and when we pushed back from the table, there was such roaring and racketing and fun. The old people were as young as any, and what with blindman buff, and leap-frog, and hide-and-seek, and molasses pulling and wrestling, and rushing out bareheaded leaving the door wide open, and boisterous glee, Thanksgiving Day meant something.

Somehow, you never later could gather that group around the same holiday table. Ring that dining bell to day, and they will not answer. The old folks long ago got through their pilgrimage. Their ankles ached, their shoulders stooped, and it was high time that they took a long rest under the shadow of the old country meeting-house. Run that bell to-day never so loudly, and all the chairs will be unoccupied save one or two. Thank God for the joys of Thanksgiving and the griefs, for they have had hallowing influences, and we have been saved from many a sin when we remembered those old times.

You may not possess all the blessings of parlor and drawing-room and library and dining-hall, but still you all know something of the height and depth and length and breadth of that sweet, tender, joyous, triumphant word "home." Look not upon it merely as a place to stay as the lion looks upon his lair, or the fox his burrow, or the eagle his eyrie. Call it not your residence, or your house, or your lodgings, or your domicile; but for the sake of your old father and mother—whether here or translated—for the sake of childhood, for the sake of the dead, for the sake of all that is good and beautiful and true and blessed, call it "home."

Gather your children together, open the musical instrument if you have one, if not, open your heart, the grandest of all musical instruments. "O! give thanks unto the Lord for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Persian Festival

WITH a history stretching back over forty centuries Persia has innumerable national events to celebrate either in joy or gloom. One of these, which is known as the festival of the martyrs of Carbella, was recently observed. The accompanying photograph pictures the scene as it was witnessed in the palace of the Governor of Maragha. The leaders, in white robes, were wailing and shouting and gesticulating wildly. They appeared to be working themselves into a frenzy. Gradually the wild voices seemed to give expression to the emotions of the people. They proceeded to self-inflicted castigation. One and another could be seen lashing themselves with mad ferocity. Even then the demoniac excitement had not reached its culmination. Only the sight of flowing blood could content participants and spectators. Knives were shed, and from great gashes cut on their own bodies blood spurted on the white robes of the infatuated leaders. It was a horrible spectacle. A Christian lady who witnessed it, hurried away sick at heart. She had been warned against appearing on the streets, for at such times public feeling against Christians runs high. But she knew that a life was at stake and she, as a physician, must see her patient. Commending herself to the protection of God, she hurried past the palace in which the festival was being held. At the entrance and at the corners of the streets there were groups of men who had taken part in it, and on the roadside lay the bodies of some who had fainted from loss of blood. Scarcely daring to look at them lest she should give offence she went on her errand of mercy, grieving that there were among the infatuated devotees to whom she dare proclaim the message of deliverance from the bondage of superstition.

Is it such a fast as I have chosen? A day for a man to afflict his soul? Wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord? (Isa. 58: 5).

Romantic Lawsuit

The Supreme Court has just given judgment in a suit which has been in the California courts for upwards of four years. It involved the fortune of two orphans, a boy and a girl, respectively ten and thirteen years of age. Some years ago, when the children were very young, they were abandoned in the streets of Hanford, Calif., and their parents could not be traced. The Women's Club of the city took charge of them, but there was some difficulty in obtaining a suitable home for them. Eventually, a childless couple offered to adopt them, and the children were transferred to their care. The couple appeared to have become very fond of the children, and the husband, when he died recently, left a will bequeathing his property to his wife for her life and after her death to the children. The will disappeared in some mysterious way, and when it was found after the widow's death, it had been mutilated. The names of the two children had been torn off. Relatives of the testator claimed the estate, and as the children were so young and had no legal guardian living, it seemed probable that they would lose their inheritance. The case, however, was fought by their friends, and witnesses were found who had seen the will before it was mutilated and could testify to its contents. The Supreme Court has now decided that the children are the legal heirs. It is well for the Christian that no such controversy can arise about his inheritance. His adoption carries all the rights of sonship. He has received the Spirit of adoption, and if children, they are heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ (Rom. 8: 15-17).

Received by the Fog

A serious mistake, which might have proved fatal, was made by a passenger on a Pennsylvania train a few days ago. He had gone forward in the train, looking for a friend, and had afterwards returned to the rear. He went from one car to another on his quest until he reached the last car on the train. He was not aware that it was the last car, and when he came to the rear door he opened it and went out on the platform. There was a dense fog at the time, which prevented his seeing that there was no other car. He stepped forward, expecting to step on the platform of the next car, but, instead, fell over into the roadway. The train was going rapidly, so that the shock was severe. He was stunned at first, but recovered consciousness after some minutes. He was scarcely able to move, but realizing how dangerous his position was, dragged himself off the track. He had barely got clear of the rails when an express train thundered over the place where he had just been lying. He was unable to walk, but was found by a telegraph operator, who took him to the nearest hospital. We may hope he will not make a similar mistake in the journey of life. But that is not so common. The common mistake in that case is that in stepping off at death there is no continuation, whereas we are assured that there is a life beyond that will never end.

The world passeth away and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever (1 John 2: 17).

A Strange Bonfire

A singular act of destruction evoked many protests in Montclair, N. J., recently. A man now resident in New York City formerly occupied a handsome home in Montclair. There he suffered a series of bereavements. His wife and children died, leaving him utterly alone. He closed his home and sent all the contents of his home to a storage warehouse. He did not go near the town again for seven years. Two weeks ago he suddenly appeared there, and going to the storage house paid a bill of over four hundred dollars for the care of his property. He had the furniture, plate and linen piled on wagons and drove with them to the woods on the brow of the Orange Mountains. The goods were then removed by his direction from the wagons and heaped together for burning. Some of the men who helped in the work begged hard that they might have some of the articles, but the owner refused. With his own hands he wielded an axe, breaking up everything breakable and then set fire to the heap and waited until all was consumed. He said that he did not wish anything to remain in existence that could remind him of the loved ones who had passed away. Most men prize the articles that have been used by their lost dear ones;

SARCOPHAGUS, SAID TO BE THAT OF ANTIPATER

One end of the sarcophagus is shown in the accompanying picture. On one side are representations in bas-relief of equestrian figures engaged in conflict, and on the other side, figures around a seated statue, probably that of Antipater himself. It is difficult to realize that this was the last resting place of the powerful warrior and statesman who died nearly twenty centuries ago. His greatness is now only a matter of history and the identity of his sarcophagus a matter of conjecture. So it is with all earthly glory. It is well for the Christian that his trust is in One who endures forever. They shall perish, but thou remainest (Heb. 1: 11).

Fighting in Christ's Tomb

A cable message from Jerusalem reports that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, surmounting the traditional tomb in which Christ's body was placed before the resurrection, was the scene of a sanguinary affray on Nov. 4, between Franciscans and Greeks, during which there were a number of casualties on both sides. The dispute arose on the question as to which community had the right to sweep the church. Troops had been posted in the vicinity for several days previous to the outbreak, in order to prevent the anticipated collision, but they were suddenly outnumbered and overpowered by the contending parties. The conflict shows how little heed the combatants must have paid to the spirit and teaching of Him whom they wanted to honor. Their conduct proved that they belonged to the very class whom he denounced:

Woe unto you, because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, and say: If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets (Matt. 23: 29).

BRIEF NOTES

Renewing subscribers will confer a great favor on the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if, when renewing, they state that their subscription is a RENEWAL, or attach, if convenient, the yellow date tab to their letter.

Rev. Henry M. Tyndall, who has been doing valuable work of an unsectarian character in the upper part of New York City, hopes to occupy the new People's Tabernacle this month. The amount already subscribed toward the cost of the building is $35,000.

Dr. Joseph Parker, the venerable Congregational Pastor of the City Temple, London, writes: "All my engagements outside my own pulpit are cancelled. I retire to think, to serve quietly, and soon to go up. May God bless all my brethren with a double portion of his Holy Spirit."

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan has just completed a notable series of fourteen lectures to Pastors, Evangelists, Sunday School Teachers, and lay workers at the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago. The subjects covered by the general title of "The Crises of the Christ" included the Incarnation, the Baptism, and the Temptation.

but this man seems to have been unable to bear the pain that would be given by the sight of objects associated with them. Perhaps he has not been able to take to himself the comfort that Paul gave to the Christians of his day:

If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him (1. Thess. 4: 14).

A Notable Discovery

Press despatches from Asia Minor report one of the most interesting finds of modern exploration. In the course of excavations at Arbali, in Konia, a wonderful sarcophagus has been dug up. It is in a state of remarkable preservation; the figures, some of which are among the most beautiful of ancient sculpture, being as sharp and unworn as when they were new. The sarcophagus strongly resembles that of Alexander, which may have served as a model for it. No clue has yet been found to the identity of the body it must once have held: but from its magnificence and from the place at which it was found, the inference is drawn that it was the coffin in which the body of Antipater was placed

The Shelter In the Woods

ALL day long they had tramped through the mountains, a man, a monkey, and a little maid. They had an organ, too, but it was wheezy and worn out, and but for the funny capers of the monkey and the sweet face of the child, the tired-looking organ-grinder would have gathered few pennies from the farm-houses he passed, though they were still haunted by lingering summer-boarders. A few city folk are wise enough to sip the cup that autumn brews, a cup garlanded with clematis and bitter-sweet, and crisp with the first sharpness of the frost. Oh, the rare charm of the fall, when the leaves are turning yellow and red, and the corn is gathered in, and the grapes are purple on the vines.

The little maid was brave, she had walked many miles with her father and the monkey, had slept under the open sky at night, or crept under the thick branches when the rain fell, had eaten such food as her father could get for her, and cuddled up under his ragged coat with the monkey at her feet, when the day's work was done, but at last she was very home-sick. For, she had a home, and a mother, and there was a bambino there, and oh! how good it would be to have her mother's eyes to look into, and her mother's hand to hold, if only father would say that the summer was ended. The woods were growing very cold, even when father built a fire in the twilight and pitched a little tent near by, and Nina could no longer think the roasted potatoes were a feast; she wanted her mother.

One night, the moon was up so very bright that they did not need a fire for light, only for warmth. And Nina was fast falling asleep when she heard a voice she knew, on the highway. She sprang up. In a mountain wagon there were a half dozen persons, returning from a drive; among them was a young lady who exclaimed, "Why, Daddy, see that bit of an encampment. Is that where the organ-grinders stay at night? What a hard life! I'll never give them such tiny bits of copper any more. They shall have silver out of my purse!"

As she spoke, Nina darted forward, a little scarlet-skirted figure, out of the deepening dusk.

"Oh, Miss Jean, Miss Jean!" she cried, clasping her little hands.

"Why, Nina Calovalla!" cried Miss Jean in her turn. "Why, my dear! Where did you come from?"

"We've been on the road, Miss Jean, Father and I," explained Nina, "but we're going home soon and I'll be at Sunday School again; I will, Miss Jean!"

The little Italian Mission child and her teacher had met by accident on a by-path of the mountains, and there followed a long talk, and at the end of it, the friends in the big wagon took up a little collection, and next day, the tent, and the organ, and the monkey, and the maiden, and the tired man, all went home.

Such a small home, tucked away in the garret of a tenement in Forsyth street, but there was a baby there, and a woman also kissed them and cried over them when the wanderers came back, and love was there, dear love that makes the poorest home as happy as a palace.

When Nina again shall go to Sunday School, and study her lesson with Miss Jean, there will not be a blither child in New York.

Games of Chance in the Parlor

The temptation to indulge in games of chance sometimes presents itself to Christians in the guise of sweet charity, and even in the white robe of a zealous religious purpose. Church fairs, in the effort to sell articles of value, too expensive for the single buyer, introduce the lottery, and social clubs of men and women, meeting for the avowed object of raising money to do good, play progressive games which are rewarded by prizes. In all these recreations and amusements, there is peril. The principle of giving full value for every dollar should penetrate all life's routine, and when this is encroached upon, the moral fibre of our nature is weakened. Gambling is an offense against honesty and honor; as much an offense when the prizes are bangles and baubles and gewgaws, as when dollars are involved and exchanged. There can never be a safe compromise with evil in this world of ours; never can one overstep the straight line without risk to one's soul, and to one's neighbors.

About Keeping a Vow

Is a vow to be broken or kept? Kept, as a rule, since probably a man does not make a vow through mere caprice, but with a certain solemnity. Yet there are circumstances which modify all cases. A young

Ho! sifted through the winds that blow,
Down comes the soft and silent snow,
White petals, from the flowers that grow
In the cold atmosphere.

These starry blossoms, pure and white,
So softly falling thro' the night

BUNGAY.

Yes, but we have sad hearts because our faith is so halting. We so little believe in God. "Our God, whom we serve is able to deliver us, and he will," let it be what it may, let the danger be ever so imminent, let the trouble be ever so overwhelming.

How firm a foundation ye saints of the Lord
Is laid for your faith, in his excellent word,
What more can he say, than to you he hath said,
Ye, who, unto Jesus for refuge have fled?

THE LITTLE BROWN LEAF.

SAID the little brown leaf, as it hung in the air,
To the little brown leaf below:
"What a summer we've had
To rejoice and be glad,
But to-day there's a feeling of snow."

"I am lonely up here on the tree so high,
With the leaves all off the bough,
So I'll flutter down
To my comrades brown,
Who are resting so softly now."

Said the little brown leaf: "When work is done,
And it's time to go to sleep,
One bids good-by to the frolic and fun,
And shuts his eyes on the merry sun
And O but the rest is deep!"

"For God is up in heaven above,
And God in the world below—
In the summer light,
In the wintry night,
In the tempest and the snow."

With a sigh as brief as the fall of a leaf,
The little brown leaf dropped through
The amber gold
Of the breeze-swept wold,
And the sky—it was blithe and blue.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Praise the Lord!

ONE cannot read the psalms of David without realizing how their music vibrates to praise.

The key-note of those beautiful ancient lyrics is rejoicing. David was a man of war, a man of the march and the tent, but he was a shepherd before he was a soldier, and he was a musician before he was a shepherd. Throughout his changeable life, he loved to strike his harp, and to sing to the Lord, ascribing to him the glory for every triumph, every rescue, every gift that came to him from the sky. For any one of us, who feels discouraged or weak; who is weary with the battle of life, and distressed at its hardships, would be a bracing exercise to study the psalms, verse by verse, writing down every text which carries with it an exhortation to praise, or which rises like the song of the lark in the morning, thrilling with ecstasy, and dominant over pain.

Comfort one another,
For the way is often dreary;
The feet are often weary,
And the heart is very sad.

THANKSGIVING AT THE HOPEWELLS

By Margaret E. Sangster.

HERE were times when Mother Hopewell felt neglected, but she never owned it. Not a neighbor, nor an acquaintance, nor the most intimate old friend ever heard her say that the big shut-up house was lonesome, that Cyrus was so deaf that he was hard to talk with, and that sometimes she wished she had at least one child to come and keep her company. Adam Hopewell was a proud old body. She had a soul that sought no sympathy from outsiders. Whatever she might do in private, no one in Daleside could report that she was anything but cheery, bright and complaining. She was growing old, but her flag was flying bravely from the masthead still.

Her husband, Cyrus Hopewell, was of a less obstinate firmness, of a much more pliant character. Cyrus had deferred to his wife through forty years of happy wedlock, and he would continue to do so till the end. He missed the children and grandchildren less than she did, but made more fuss about it in the privacy of their home. To the public he was as silent as Miranda, knowing that she wished it, and that it would vex her if he seemed to be finding fault.

The Hopewell boys, John and James, were prosperous merchants in New York. Ruth Hopewell was a successful artist in Boston. Margaret was married, and had a brood of small children, who kept her busy in her wee parsonage home in the far West. Cynthia, a president of a college in the South, came back for summer holidays when she did not go to Europe, but he had not passed a single Thanksgiving under the parental roof, since her girlhood. The old mother thought wistfully of her bonny boys and girls, as they had been, when they grew up, all too busy and too useful, and too successful to have time to spare for father and mother. "If Cyrus and I should die, they'd come to our funerals," she said to herself, as she pattered over the bureau drawer where she kept as treasures such things as mothers prize—a few faded ribbons, a baby's sock, a pair of little red shoes, the certificates Jack brought home from the Academy, the gold medal Cynthia won for a composition, just the bitsam and jetsam of youth that the grown up children had left behind and forgotten.

"Let us die together, good Lord," he said, kneeling at the low chair by the western window. Thanksgiving was near, and her heart was heavy. She realized that she stood in the forefront of the family, alone; almost she heard the faint boom of the wave that would soon sweep her with the rest of her generation out into the silence and mystery of the eternal sea.

The sons and daughters had invited their parents to keep Thanksgiving with them, but both Cyrus and Miranda shrunk from the state and splendor of John's avenue mansion, and the gay people at James's house, equally frightened them, as if they were beings of another sphere.

To go to Margaret's, that would be dead, but Margaret, dear child, lived so far away, four whole days' journey, and they hardly felt equal to the fatigue.

"Miranda!" It was Cyrus calling from the foot of the stairs. "Here's Mrs. Loomis. Won't you come down?"

"Yes, dear, coming!" answered a brisk voice, and the old lady hurried down to welcome the wife of her minister.

After a little talk, Mrs. Loomis unfolded her scheme, a kind one, which she was quite eager over, pressing the matter with gentle insistence.

"Frank and I are so by ourselves in the world, both being orphans, that we can never get up a family party on a holiday, but we've been thinking how fine it would be if you and Mr. Hopewell would step across the road and help us eat our Thanksgiving turkey. Now, please, please don't say no, dear Mrs. Hopewell."

The invitation was graciously refused, but a counter one was given. Would not the pastor and his wife come to them, and bring little Theodore and Agnes, and to this Mrs. Loomis consented. She went home with a glow at her heart, meaning that it should not be her fault if the day did not prove delightful to her old friends, for, with womanly intuition, she divined how dreary holidays were for them, and both her husband and herself were genuinely indignant with the Hopewell children.

But, in James Hopewell's house, there was a silent, thoughtful laddie, who took very little part in the roistering games of the rest. And, for the past year, a fear had tugged at his mother's heart, that this boy was not to be long spared to her. For him to express a wish was to have it gratified, and he said one evening:

"Mother, I'd like to have a great house rally of our kith and kin, up at grandfather's in Daleside. Could it be managed? I'd love one Thanksgiving there. Somehow, I feel as if I'd get stronger if grandmother could take care of me, as she did that winter I broke my leg skating on the Daleside pond."

"Dear darling! wouldn't mother be pleased to hear you?" said the pretty lady in the soft gown; the lady of the anxious eyes. "Tell me just what you'd plan, if you could, and—I'll consult Daddy, and—we'll see!"

means were ample there, and food abundant, the city housewives decided to pack big hampers with delicacies and to carry a supply of cooked and canned provisions, for, "we are a troop, and enough to tax any commissary department in New England," said John's wife.

Three days before Thanksgiving, just as the twilight deepened into starry night, the latch was lifted, and to the two old people sitting by the hearth, entered Ruth. She was a slender woman, with a lovely face, and her clothing was as a sheath to a lily. She slipped off her furs and sat down, half crying, half laughing, at her mother's knee.

"I've come home, Mammy; home for Thanksgiving," she said, and the gladness of Mother Hopewell's face repaid her for leaving her studio in the midst of the busy season, and missing two opening views on which she had counted.

Early the next day she went to the post-office, and returned with a letter.

"Maggie's taken it into her head to come," she announced. "Mother, we'll have to open the whole house, heat it, furbish it, make it like old times. Won't it be fun?"

Other letters kept coming. Cyrus, dear old fellow, grew so excited that he could not keep still. He looked a dozen years younger.

The Loomises found it out, that a big house party was on foot, and they were fain to withdraw from their pledge to be at the dinner, but Mother Hopewell would not hear of such a thing. "Why," she said with decision, "we always had the minister's folks in the old days, and now the old days are coming back. We'll not do without his reverence and the mistress of the manse, not we." Ruth seconded her mother so warmly that Mrs. Loomis laid aside her fears, and began to help with the grand preparations.

Thanksgiving Eve, the rural expressman drove up and left an immense box filled with hot-house flowers, a novelty in the country, so far from town florists, and a basket of grapes, oranges, bananas and fruits conserved in sugar.

And, then, an hour later, when the nine o'clock train arrived, there was Margaret with a baby in her arms, and a chubby child clinging to her skirts, and three more little heads behind her, with the tall, pale, tired-looking home missionary bringing up the rear. After the greetings had subsided, and they were tucked into their rooms, a carriage came, and here were James and his wife and their boy Hugh, who was the prime mover and mainspring of the family gathering, the clans having responded to his summons, so to speak. That was sufficient for that night.

Next morning the rest arrived, all smiling, jolly, hilarious, and never did father and mother look more elated than Mr. and Mrs. Hopewell as they stood in the doorway to welcome old and young who came thronging in.

"All here but Cynthia!" sighed the mother. "Poor Cynthia! If she could be here, too!"

Even as she spoke, there was a jingle of sleigh bells, for snow had fallen over night, and a sleigh from West Daleside glided up to the back door, skirting the driveway with a flourish. And out stepped Cynthia, a dignified figure, whose was the serenity born of much managing of gay Southern lasses, sweet and mirthful, and obedient notwithstanding their high spirits, to the lightest look or word of their New England president. Cynthia, too! The family group was complete.

In the clear, bracing air of the hills, with his grandmother's old-fashioned nursing, Hugh Hopewell picked up strength, lost his white cheeks, and grew sturdy and robust, as they had not thought he would. Wonderful are the effects of fresh air when it blows across leagues of mountain space, and has no taint of the city in its free breath.

"I shall stay here!" said the lad, "and learn farming, and by and by forestry. Grandfather should have one boy to stand at his side."

"OUT STEPPED CYNTHIA . . . AND THE FAMILY GROUP WAS COMPLETE"

The result was, that a great many letters, with special delivery stamps, were written, and several telegrams sent. To Margaret there went a generous remittance in money. She was to bring her whole family, down to the baby, and her husband was to find a supply for his pulpit and come along. The Hopewell connection was stirred to its remotest bound, and the two stout, gray-headed brothers entered into the plot with an elan that amazed their wives and their young people. John and James began themselves to take a keen interest in going home for Thanksgiving.

It was at first meant to have the whole thing a surprise, but Cynthia recklessly telephoned to Jack from Georgia, that a surprise might be too great a shock to the old father and mother. Finally they arranged for Ruth to go first, casually, for her to break the news that Margaret was coming, then James and his wife, and the invalid boy would follow, and at last, on Thanksgiving morning, the remainder of the clan, fifteen in all, would pile in and overflow the homestead. Although

"We'll not leave Mother alone so much," resolved one and another daughter and granddaughter. She needs some one to help her, now that she is growing more feeble than she used to be."

But when they canvassed the matter, there was not one whose occupations would let him or her make a home at Daleside. Hugh was the single one who had a free foot. And Madam Hopewell, overhearing considerable discussion, ended the balancing of pros and cons with her usual directness and energy.

"Now, Jane, and Cynthia, Ruth, Mabel, Maggie, Ellen and all of you, I am not in my dotage. I don't want any chick or child to come here to take care of me. I'm able to take care of father and myself yet. What I do ask, is that there may not be such long spaces between visits. Let the old home beckon you back oftener. Don't leave us to such wofully long spells without you, and come to us on holidays. I wish the children might oftener be at the farm in the summers. And I'll coddle Hughie and make a man of him again; and one thing makes my Thanksgiving sweeter, Hugh wants to stay with grandmother!"

"That he does!" cried Hugh from the depth of the big armchair in the next room.

"Returned Upon His Own Head"

A Remarkable Instance, in Real Life, of a Man's Impious Arrogance, Leading to His Ruin

"I WILL break you up then," said the proprietor of a large distillery in Western Pennsylvania, about the year 1875, to his new neighbor. "I will start a coal-mining business right here upon my own property and I will run you out," he declared.

The newcomer had recently opened up a coal mine near the distillery, and the distiller had hoped to profit by the convenience and saving it would be to him in buying coal. The coal operator, being a Christian man, had positively refused to furnish any coal for the purpose of manufacturing the soul and body destroying product.

The man did not, of course, like to be reproved or opposed in his plans, and was of a very wrathful and vindictive disposition. In his anger, he was stirred up to that point of presumption which often brings men under present judgment. Napoleon reached that perilous point when he made the defiant reply to Madame de Stael, "I propose and I dispose." She had met his boastful plans with the words of caution,—"Beware! Man proposes, but God disposes." Like the fig tree after it was cursed by Christ, Napoleon's fortunes declined from that time.

Many circumstances seemed calculated to help fulfil the distiller's threat, and the offended man proceeded to carry it out. Against the coal operator was the dullness of the times, the strong competition in the business, and, still worse, the heavy obligations he had to meet in the near future. For several seasons prosperity was seemingly sure to abide with the distiller. His brand of whiskey had a wide reputation, and he had already built up a large business. He owned the buildings, etc., and besides that possessed a good tract of coal land. Altogether, it did not appear likely that "his mischief should return upon his own head, and that his violent dealing should come down upon his own pate."—Psa. 7:16. It did though, nevertheless, for his very efforts to fulfil his threat were the direct means of his own bankruptcy in the end. He had to go nearly $100,000 into debt in sinking a shaft and getting all the machinery, coal-tipple and other things set up, which were necessary to conveniently and economically handle the coal in quantities. He expected, however, to manage the debts all right in due time, for he had already proven his capacity for business.

But, when matters became most deeply involved, a few unforeseen things occurred which overturned everything upon him. The famous whiskey which he manufactured made a man drunk, who, while in that condition, insulted his wife and daughters. The same anger which he had exercised towards his Christian neighbor was again so stirred that he procured a gun and shot the drunken man dead. For this he was confined in the penitentiary several years. During his confinement there was no person to attend to his business who understood it, and who would take a sufficient interest in it to properly manage the distillery and the new coal business venture. The result was that the creditors rushed in to save their claims. Everything was sacrificed. His family was left penniless, and in such straits that one of his daughters had to apply for assistance to the very man her father had sought to destroy. Her request was for the use of a room in one of the buildings which he controlled. She wanted to teach school in it. He was glad to return good for evil, and told her she might have the whole building if she needed it, and entirely free of charge also.

About a quarter of a century has passed away. Nothing remarkable has occurred in the history of the first mine. With the other, however, it is different, although it changed hands under the sheriff's hammer, a kind of blight seems to still rest upon it. People notice it, and every once in a while they feel called upon to say, "There goes that — Mine again," on account of some evil happening. Once it was a great explosion, causing many fatalities. At another time, more recently, it was a fire, which destroyed both original and added improvements to the extent of tens of thousands of dollars. Besides these, there were other things of a similar nature. Like the rebuilding of Jericho, the mine appears to be under a curse. Judgment is God's strange work. He delights not in it. Occasions sometimes call for it though. He would, as he says, much rather be exercising his loving kindness in the earth, and men should be in condition to receive it instead of the other.

The Story of a Poem

Few poems have had a stranger history than that beginning—

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some other shore,
And bright in heaven's jewelled crown
They shine for evermore.

The lines are usually credited to Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton; they appear over his name in scores of "reciters" and anthologies. The author, however, is Mr. J. L. McCreery, of Washington, who published the poem in a Philadelphia journal in 1863. In the following year a Mr. Eugene Bulmer concluded an article on immortality, contributed to a Chicago paper, with the verses, omitting to state their source. The poem with the signature "E. Bulmer" was copied into a Wisconsin periodical. Jumping to the conclusion that "Bulmer" was a misprint for "Bulwer," the editor of another Wisconsin paper changed the "m" to a "w," and so the world came into apparent possession of a new poem by the author of "Rienzi." His name gave it an immense popularity; it appeared in most of the newspapers of the English-speaking world. Despite the statement by "Owen Meredith," in 1870, that none of the Lyttons had ever heard of the poem, it has been circulating ever since with "Edward Bulwer," "Bulwer Lytton," or "Lord Lytton" as signature.

Artistic Monuments COST NO MORE THAN PLAIN ONE

in White Bronze Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides, it is very expensive. White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly a hundred public monuments. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. SAPOLIO

NEW YORK'S LATEST "SETTLEMENT"

It is the Gift of Mr. J. D. Rockefeller, Jr., and is a Model of its Kind

AMONG the many structures in New York City devoted to social and philanthropic purposes, there are few that are more unique than the new building known as the Westside Neighborhood House, which has lately been erected in connection with the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church. It is located at No. 501 West Fiftieth street, and is understood to be the gift of Mr. J. D. Rockefeller, Jr., costing $100,000. The Settlement will have the usual educational, social and philanthropic features, and in a religious sense it will be evangelical and undenominational.

Connected with this work is the Armitage chapel, at No. 741-743 Tenth avenue, which, besides a good-sized auditorium has a primary department, four individual class rooms and two administration rooms. The Neighborhood House is a fire-proof five-story building with many club rooms, baths, auditorium, reception and sitting rooms, kindergarten and day nursery, bedrooms for resident, library and class rooms, gymnasium, cooking and manual training rooms, and the roof is to be used as a garden. It will literally be a model club house for the West Side poor. No attempt will be made to duplicate work done by other Christian Churches of any denomination whatever.

The Lepers of the Philippines

MANILA, PHILIPPINES, Sept. 10, 1901.
To The Christian Herald:

YOUR paper is a great delight to us, away off here in this corner of the globe, and I write to interest you in the poor lepers of these islands. It is said that many years ago, the Spaniards sent a boat loaded with priests to China, and that the boat came back filled with lepers. Be this as it may, we have collected here five to six hundred of them and propose very soon to place them on an island, where their families may live at one side and visit them daily. They have been driven from place to place, and have had no word of sympathy, only hearing the old cry of "unclean!" Now we are trying to make a place attractive and home-like for them. They are very musical and many of the younger members of the families are educated. We are anxious to get a piano and some musical instruments for them, and we would ask the readers of your paper if they will not help us. We are arranging for a Christmas celebration and have had material given for a few loose wrappers, which we are making up for them—also some bright fancy bags, made of cretons.

If you could help us to bring a little sunshine into the lives of these people, it would be a great charity. We want bright pictures, and anything that will help to make them feel that we care for them, as Christ cares for us, even though each of us must be lepers in his sight. Mrs. L. M. MAUS.

[We commend our correspondent's plea to our readers. Apropos, it is interesting to note that leprosy in Hawaii has greatly decreased since that island came under our control.]

To Wear Out or to Rust Out?

We have been told that a noted New York clergyman, who died suddenly a short time ago, was warned by his physicians, several years before the end, that, unless he ceased work altogether, he could live only five years at the utmost. "That is as God pleases," he said. "My part is to fill up the measure of my life with work." And he worked literally to the last gasp.

To wear out, to the earnest soul seems far more desirable than to rust out. Better strenuous toil than inglorious repose. There may be a golden mean, however.

THE WINTER WINDS

November breezes, sharp and chill,
Without one note of cheery glee,
Are singing over vale and hill
And bring sad memories to me.

The birds in flocks go swiftly by,
To find a home in warmer clime;
And tiny snowflakes softly lie
On ground late covered over with rime.

But though the scene is dull and drear,
Hopes fair and sweet to me are borne,
When winter's past, bring will draw near,
And Earth rejoice in gladsome dawn.

Thanksgiving Sunshine

What the Society is Doing to Gladden the World at this Festive
Time of the Year...

THE Sunshine Branches among the colored people always celebrate Thanksgiving Day. Some of the most enthusiastic workers may not have sufficient clothes to keep them warm as the cold days come on, but they plan well for the Thanksgiving turkey. Many reports have been sent in at headquarters telling how great dinners were to be given, where every member of the branch would be invited. For months pennies have been saved, and lines laid for "a great time" Thanksgiving Day.

A letter running over with expressions of thankfulness comes from the colored have, as they expressed it, "the best time of their lives" this Thanksgiving.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunshine Branch is growing so rapidly that now almost every State in the Union is represented. The requests made for reading matter were so promptly answered that within a week from the time of publication all the members I had in mind were supplied with more than they could read in months.

Sunshiners might send papers and magazines to a little library in Colorado—a free Sunshine library, where everybody for miles about is free to stop and take branch at Live Oak School, Baton Rouge, La. Mrs. Ada C. Pollock Blundon, the president, writes: "We have been here twelve years in Live Oak School, and while we feel we have done little, we are, nevertheless, thankful for having been able to do that little. It takes only 10 cents a week to pay the tuition for a year's schooling here and still there are many little boys and girls in the neighborhood who have no one enough interested in them to furnish that small sum. I wonder if there is not some one who would like to give a thank offering for some great blessing bestowed upon them during the last year."

The Nebraska State Federation of Women's Clubs is trying to raise a fund sufficient to pay for the training of a young colored girl in a kindergarten. When she has taken the full course she will be engaged as teacher to the colored people somewhere in the South. Miss Anna Vanderzee of Lincoln, a Sunshine member, hopes to get the scholarship. Mrs. Anna E. Moore, of Myrtle, Neb., is state president of Nebraska Sunshine.

Mrs. J. B. Coates, a prominent woman in charity work in Laurel, Md., told her friends that she thought the colored folks ought not to be forgotten this Thanksgiving time; but she got little sympathy, and had to do her organizing almost alone. The colored people, however, appreciated what this one white woman tried to do, and showed their gratitude in many ways. Several families will meet together and books and papers. Mrs. M. E. Young, of 4328 York Street, Denver, Col., is an invalid, and shut-in, whose chief joy is in dealing out good papers and other reading matter where it is wanted. The smelters all call for magazines, no matter how old. All the workmen about know they are welcome to them. Invalids send for short stories, that are cut out and pasted.

There are 38 workers of this Sunshine Branch, and Mrs. Young is president. Our friends should see that she is supplied.

Miss Annie Fields Alden, Metuchen, N. J., has charge of a large Missionary Sunshine Branch, and can use all the Sunday School cards sent her. She can use all kinds of clothing as well.

One dear woman who lives out in the mountains of Montana, with a broken back, writes: "Oh, Dear Sunshine! My mail comes only once in three weeks. Please, please don't forget to send me something. It seems as if my heart would break when the mail carrier passes me by and I know I must wait another long three weeks before I can even get a post-card from the great big world again."

Mrs. Mary Watkins, of Mesa Grande, Cal., is Sunshine President of the Sunshine Branch at Mesa Grande. For food they have been obliged lately to resort to boiled grass, and some of the children are almost naked for the want of clothes. The matrons and field workers will see that every article is utilized. So in clearing out your garrets, do not forget to make up a barrel for the Indian branches.

MISS STONE MAY NOW BE FREE

IF intimations contained in the cable despatches from Constantinople are to be relied upon, Miss Ellen M. Stone, the captive missionary, who for many weeks past has been a prisoner in the hands of brigands, may now be free. United States Consul-General Dickinson, it was stated, had been authorized by our Government to sign an agreement that the bandits should not be punished. This

ELLEN M. STONE
(From an Early Photograph)

"Ellen M. Stone was my most familiar friend in our school days and during our young womanhood—a friendship that has never been broken. She was sent out to the foreign field by the ladies of the three Congregationalist Churches of Chelsea, Mass. Miss Stone was a member of the Chestnut Street Congregational Church, Rev. Mr. Tittsworth, now of Milwaukee, being pastor. She went to the foreign field at the same time that I was sent to the home missionary field. She was a teacher in the city of Chelsea when she resigned to go abroad. That was in October, 1878. Her mother and my mother were early friends. Miss Stone is 55 or 56 years of age. She always addresses me as 'Dear Silent Partner,' because we are so far apart.

"Miss Stone chose the foreign field because she felt that there was such a dearth of interest in that work, even though she was doing finely in the home field. She had charge of the Infant Department in her own home church; she was a fine singer, and lent her influence and assistance to many phases of church work. Her heart, however, was fixed on working abroad. She was an only daughter.

"Myra," she said to me: 'I have this hope, that by my going—when humanly speaking, I would be greatly needed here, being an only daughter—other hearts may be turned to the foreign field, and that my going will quicken the interest of many in that branch of the work.'

"And surely it has been so. Her mother, before Ellen's birth, was deeply interested in foreign missions. She publicly dedicated her daughter to the Lord, saying: 'I dedicate this child to thee; take her into thy service and, if it is thy will, into the foreign field.' But she never told her daughter, and Ellen never knew it until after her decision to go abroad, when her mother told her.

"Miss Stone was at one time on the editorial staff of a religious paper, under Dr. H. M. Dexter. She was a rare worker in every department. She is vivacious, bright, sunny, and active, delighting to be a comfort to every one with whom she comes in contact."

Our photograph of Miss Stone is one taken twenty years ago, in the earlier years of her missionary career. It is furnished through the kindness of Mrs. Steele.

was demanded by Miss Stone's captors as an indispensable preliminary to her release. The amount of ransom finally agreed upon was said to be $50,000. Mme. Tsilka, Miss Stone's companion, will also be liberated, no ransom being demanded in her case.

Mrs. Almira S. Steele, the well-known Christian worker, and Founder of the Steele Home for Colored Orphans at Chattanooga, Tenn., was the intimate friend and companion of Miss Ellen M. Stone in her school days. Mrs. Steele has been deeply interested in the fate of the abducted missionary. To a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mrs. Steele said:

Training for Work in India

ONE feature of home life in India impresses every visitor. It is the hardships of the women. The custom of child marriage, now happily beginning to lose its observance among the more educated classes, is fruitful of misery. Many of these girl wives are mothers when they are only twelve or thirteen, and some have large families before they are twenty. The result is seen in the prematurely aged faces of women of thirty years, and the decrepitude of women of forty. Then, too, many thousands of women suffer needlessly. In the Mohammedan households they are secluded, and there are many Hindus who also require their wives to live in retirement. This is especially true in Northern India, where the freedom permitted to women in large Western cities like Bombay is unknown. Shut up in the zenanas, the women's quarters of their husbands' houses, they often suffer torture for years which any American doctor could relieve or cure in a few hours. Many of them would be horrified at the idea of a man visiting them or prescribing for them. Sometimes no attempt is made to give them relief, and very often the ignorant native woman doctors who are called, apply silly charms or absurd and barbarous remedies, which do more harm than the disease. Native doctors will often prescribe for patients whom they have not seen, whose symptoms are described by their husbands, and the best that can be hoped for in such cases is that the so-called remedies will be harmless. Beneficial they cannot be.

Some time ago, a well-educated native physician, Dr. P. B. Keskar, whose self-denying work during the horrors of the famine made his name familiar to our readers, visited this country and witnessed the noble work being done here for the medical education of women. He saw at once how great a blessing a woman trained in one of our colleges might be in his native land. There would be no prejudice against her entering the zenanas and giving relief to the suffering women. Husbands who would not permit a man to visit their wives would be glad to avail themselves of the help of a skilful woman doctor. Dr. Keskar determined to consecrate his daughter to this noble service, and she, a highly educated girl, gladly acquiesced. She is now here waiting to begin her studies at the Philadelphia Women's Medical College. She will need some assistance in the payment of fees and for the purchase of books and instruments. We are sure that among our readers and in the Christian public of America there are many who will gladly unite to remove that obstacle to her noble ambition. It will be a pleasure to send this grand Christian girl back to India fully equipped with the best education America can give, that she may minister to the souls and bodies of her suffering sisters in her native land. Contributions sent to this journal for the purpose will be gladly received and acknowledged.

A Singular Papyrus

Among the papyri recently acquired by the University of Strasburg are some remains of a curious Greek poem on creation, in which the word logos is used of a Divine person. The universe, says the poet, was in confusion, the four elements—water, fire, air and earth—being at war with one another. The supreme deity, Zeus, sent, therefore, his son Hermes with the golden "wand of order." Peace was restored, and the fabric of the world was constructed, but the only light was the pale radiance of the stars. "Then went forth Hermes, with his glorious son, the Logos, to seek out a place on the earth where he might build a city." The poem is not earlier than 300 A.D., so that there is ample room for Christian influence, but, on the other hand, it is possible that it represents, not Christian thought, but speculation in non-Christian circles.

NOT FAR FROM HOME!

Not far from home! 'Tis but a little way—
This life's horizon lies just over there—
A few short years—or months—perchance a day
And I, the heavy burden that I bear,
Shall lay aside—not rudely, but as falls
The eyelid down to sleep—and thus respond
To that behest, by which the Father calls
Not out of life, but into life—beyond.

RIDPATH'S HISTORY OF THE WORLD isn't like that history you hated so when you went to school—a rusty, dusty, musty "work," written by a spectacled old fact-digger who never saw the STORY-MATERIAL in what he unearthed and mumbled over in such dreary commonplace. You SEE the scenes that Dr. Ridpath tells you about.

Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and you see him reel before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream had come.

Rome perches maniac Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand as the synonym of savage cruelty for eighteen centuries.

Xerxes, from his platform on Egaleos, overlooks the battle of Salamis and sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written.

—Three historical incidents out of thousands that are made REAL by reading what a historian gifted with imagination and the story-telling faculty has to say about them.

MOREOVER, there is no historical REFERENCE work that approaches RIDPATH'S in value. All the lands of the earth are visited; the history of every nation is fully told. Its index is a wonderful affair.

GOSPEL PROGRESS IN AFRICA

A CHRISTIAN FAMILY AT PAKUTI, EAST AFRICA
(The group is in front of the Inhambane Mission School)

CHRISTIANITY is making rapid progress in East Africa. In a letter to a friend in Connecticut, who is warmly interested in his missionary work, the Rev. Erwin H. Richards, of the Methodist Mission at Inhambane, writes:

"I pray you to remember us again, for it is a famine year with us. All foods are exorbitantly dear, but we must feed our children. Everything counts. Our mission is doing nicely, although at present we have none but native teachers, trained on the spot, to help us out. We have all the children for whom we can provide, but were means forthcoming, would readily take more. May God open the doors for you as he sees we have need."

Accompanying Mr. Richards' letter is a very interesting photograph of a group of native Christians at the Inhambane Mission station. These are members of one family, all of whom have been won from heathenism. They have adopted to some extent the manners and dress of civilization, and, as the picture shows, all are more or less clad, in strong contrast with their unevangelized neighbors in the same section, who still cling to the heathen dress and the customs handed down through ages of savageism.

The Inhambane Mission has done excellent Gospel work since it was first founded some ten years ago. Some of the workers have passed away, others are laboring for Christ in different fields, but Mr. Richards, the pioneer and founder, still plods on faithfully and prayerfully, confident that God's blessing is on the work, and that it will yet accomplish much for the regeneration of the benighted people of East Africa.

A SOUL-SAVING CHURCH

AN extraordinary record was presented recently at the annual meeting of a Wesleyan Methodist Church in Manchester, England. The church grew out of a mission established fifteen years ago. The report showed that there are no less than twenty-one public services, with an average of 15,000 attendances every Sunday. Each week there are thirty-three prayer-meetings, nine Bible classes, eighty fellowship meetings, with a membership of 5,212, four theological classes, thirty open-air services, and twenty-one lodging-house gatherings. When it is remembered that the voluntary workers number over 1,000, some idea may be formed of the numerous channels through which their energies are directed. Almost every form of Christian activity is attempted, and were it not for this trained and ever-willing band of workers, it would be impossible to continue the mission on so extensive a scale.

An outstanding feature of the organization is the care which is taken of the young. Over 2,500 scholars attend the Sunday Schools, and nearly 1,000 of these meet in Christian fellowship. In the Ragged Schools and Special Children's Services the poorest and most neglected are reached. Everything is done to cheer the homes of such, and to give them a chance of improving their condition.

Facing the evils of drunkenness, gambling, impurity, special and vigorous efforts are made to lay hold of the working men and women, and every Saturday evening over 4,000 persons attend the temperance gatherings. Not only at these meetings, but daily, an earnest pledge-signing crusade is maintained. The Aggressive Leagues have been worked with increased vigor, and are doing effective service, both in rescuing the drunkard and gambler, and in surrounding those saved with helpful influences. The difficult work of midnight missions has also had satisfactory results, which give cause for deep thankfulness. The workers patiently and perseveringly persist in their efforts to save sad lives, and many wonderful trophies of rescue reward them. In these midnight efforts there is equal need, and ample scope, for work among fallen men. These have been gathered to special meetings held at the midnight hour, and the efforts made have borne abundant fruit. The Tuesday midday services have become increasingly popular, and it is impossible to exaggerate the value of such a service at noon on Manchester's busiest day. Fifteen departments of social work are judiciously and successfully maintained, and only one desire is kept in view—to give every man and woman a chance, however destitute and degraded.

The Gospel in Syria

During a recent tour in Syria a Christian lady reached the town of Bekfeya where she found what she appropriately calls, "an open door." She writes: "Bekfeya and neighborhood is the seat of the Archbishop and Bishop of the Maronite Church, which is practically Roman Catholicism. Dr. B. Manesseh for some time has had a dispensary there, and administers healing to the bodies and souls of the people; but he can only give one day in the week, having other heavy calls to attend to. Since starting the dispensary there, he has had several messages to leave the place from the Maronite bishop, who even offered to pay all the expenses he has incurred if he would only go; but he feels that the Lord has set before him an open door, and he dare not shut it. It is an 'open door' as regards the people themselves. They gladly listen. One man said to me, 'If you would only stay three months I could gather fifty people to hear. We do not want your money; we want to hear.' This very man said to me, 'Pray for me, I am a sinner'—and he was a Maronite. It was joy to tell him of the Saviour."

• A Relief Journey Across China •

responsibility in regard to it, but I succeeded in stowing it in an armored car, in which were some French soldiers. At Tingchow, I was met by the magistrate, who had been previously notified of my coming from Peking. He gave me a guard of twenty-one mounted men, and accompanied me a considerable distance towards the next station. I now began to realize the full import of the 'Choen Pai.' It not only meant that I was to be given an escort to ensure my safety, but that, in addition, my guards were to provide me with food and the best lodging at night that was in their power. Not only was I not compelled to put up at ordinary Chinese inns, but in many cases I found lodgings prepared for us in some of the best houses of the villages through which we passed. On more than one night I slept in a deserted temple. At every township or village, the highest local official would invariably come out to meet us. In some cases they invited me to a sort of feast. I was surprised to find how well informed they all were of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Relief Fund. Each in turn thanked me as its representative, and they all seemed to regard it as a sort of generosity of which only Americans are capable. They said that they knew that some money was being raised in America for the famine sufferers, but none of them had any idea that the amount was so large.

"As we continued on our journey westward," Mr. Allen went on, "the character and uniform of my guards constantly changed. During one day's journey they consisted of two men armed, and two others, one of whom carried a spear and the other an umbrella. One set of guards had a band, consisting of a kettle drum and a triangle. The triangle was tinkled every ten minutes, and the drum beaten every hour. At T'ai-yuan, my journey's end, I was most pleasantly received by the viceroy, who repeated what the subordinate officials had said in thanks and appreciation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's efforts on behalf of the sufferers."

All the sycee in Mr. Allen's caravan was forwarded from Fungtai-wan to Singan. It formed the nucleus of the funds at Mr. Duncan's disposal. Since then, at Mr. Duncan's request, 15,000 taels more have been sent to him from Hankow, on the Yangtse River.

The latest report from Mr. Duncan in Singan is a letter just received in Tientsin, dated September 6, Mr. Duncan says: "The testimony of even those officials who wish to minimise the famine horrors is, at least thirty per cent. of the population throughout the province have perished." The governor has kindly offered every assistance, and the Tao-tai, who had charge of government relief, is now working in co-operation with Dr. Smith and myself in organizing relief. Within a few days, some 50,000 taels will be transferred into bread. The method adopted is as follows: The lists of the needy are revised and then relief given to cases verified by those deputed by the government and by the foreigners. The relief has been both timely and beneficial. In order to secure immediate distribution, the governor promised to make up any deficiency should the funds be insufficient to place into the hands of all the poorest sum of not less than $1 at once."

All around this doorway of north China are the signs of war and devastation. In order to reach Tientsin, the traveler has to take the railroad at Tongku, about 40 miles distant. The country between the two places is a vast marsh, which somewhat resembles "the flats" between Jersey City and Newark. It is drained only very imperfectly by crude canals, which have existed for centuries. Yet living over this huge malarial waste is a population of more than 180,000. Apparently on almost every large mud bank is a village of mud-houses, where generations of Chihli Chiamen have lived in absolute defiance of all accepted laws of health. Their principal occupation is making bricks out of the lay mud at the bottom of the marsh.

It was along these canals and through these swamps that the foreign troops advanced upon Tientsin, and the condition of the villages to-day shows that they spared not. As the railroad train grinds along on its embankment, the passenger can see thousands of mud huts, from which the thatched roofs are gone, standing in absolute desolation in the slimy, oozy water. This destruction is the work of the invading army. No painter could want a better picture of man adding to a natural desolation in nature. Here and there along the canals are junks with half naked coolies, who look more like animals than human beings. But the villages have gone; simply wiped out.

The chief military strength of Tientsin formerly lay in its mud walls. These, the foreign Provisional Government and the allied troops are rapidly demolishing, and in their place building a wide, macadamized road, which will extend round the entire city.

Foreigners in their different concessions are busy repairing the wrecked buildings. Chinese carpenters and bricklayers are at work on every side, which gives to the most injured streets something the appearance of a western "boom" town. Soldiers are everywhere; all but Americans, who do not care for "concessions" nor contend for foreign territory.

To walk through the streets of Tientsin is to have forcibly impressed upon one the fact that the Chinese are accustomed to bearing burdens. Only in front of market wagons, which come from the country, one finds mules or small horses. All the rest of the draying is done by human beings. A low truck with small wheels is loaded down with cases of merchandise, three or four coolies push and shove behind, and a dozen more pull at ropes in front. Progress is slow. The faces of the human dray horses are sometimes painful to look upon. They struggle and perspire and stagger at the load. But this is the way that loads have been drawn through Chinese streets for hundreds of years. The streets have no attempt at sidewalks and only the principal ones are macadamized. For the rest, it would hardly be exaggeration to say that they are not streets at all. They are only a tangle of narrow lanes between the houses, always muddy even in dry weather and redolent with a composite of smells.

The one man to whom more Tientsin Christians owe their lives than any other human agency, is Mr. Edward Cousins, the great missionary merchant of the city. Mr. Cousins is head of the British Municipal Council, and one of the richest men in Tientsin. He is a devoted Christian, and when the Boxer attack began, he turned his splendid residence and compound into a place of refuge for more than fifty missionaries and nearly a thousand Chinese converts. From his own warehouse, he supplied them with food. He organized a hospital corps, and protected them until relief came. The men who were directing the Boxer guns knew that Mr. Cousins's home sheltered missionaries, and for that reason specially directed their fire against it. I was shown yesterday a recently stopped hole in the roof of the veranda, where a shell came through and exploded not far from where two missionaries were sitting. That they escaped seems almost a miracle.

Other merchants, knowing that Chinese converts were the especial object of Boxer hatred, objected to Mr. Cousins harboring native Christians. His reply was "If you drive them out, fifty missionaries will go too, and you will be responsible for turning that number of American and British subjects over to the mercy of the enemy." These arguments prevailed, and the nucleus of the missionary churches in Tientsin to-day were saved.

The Methodist Thankoffering

The general Methodist plan of raising $200,000 as a Thankoffering Fund for the advancement of the religious work of that denomination, has now reached a total of over $13,000,000. It was intended to complete the fund by January 1, 1902, but it is now probable that the time limit will be extended. Methodists of Manhattan and the Bronx have contributed some $400,000 of the $1,000,000 they pledged as their part of the fund.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Audubon and Humboldt*

HUMBOLDT was to appear at the Academy, and the portfolios of his invaluable discoveries were to be on exhibition. Audubon, as an art student, obtained permission to see the folios of the great savant, and he took Knitter (his old French governess from Nantes) with him. He loved her, because she had prophesied good of him.

The two passed along the gay streets and into the halls made renowned by Cuvier. They entered the exhibition room where the priceless books lay under guard.

After they had seen them they sat down together on a seat apart from those allotted to the members of the Academy, and waited for the great Humboldt to arrive.

"He used to be a feeble boy," said the Knitter, "and they did not regard him as very bright; but he loved plants, and they called him the 'little apothecary.' He associates with kings now."

"But he lived for his cosmology," said Audubon. "He never thought of associating with kings in his early studies. He exiled himself for the true knowledge of science." The members were coming in, many of them wearing decorations.

At last the hall rang with sudden applause. Humboldt appeared, and on his heart shone a golden star that had been given him by the Russian court. He wore the decorations of greatest royal societies.

How grand he looked—that wonderful man who had trod the summits of the Andes, sailed the unknown rivers under the Southern Cross, and enriched the charts of the stars!

Society people took snuff in those days, or pretended to do so. It was a sign of hospitality among such men as these rather than habit, and a snuff-box was passed around.

It was made of gold, and was studded with jewels. It gleamed.

"The Emperor of Russia gives snuff-boxes to those who most benefit mankind," said the Knitter of Nantes to young Audubon. "It may be he will send you one some day." The boy naturalist started.

"Why do you dream such things as that? It is your heart that dreams. But how dare I to say it—I see what I would most like to be in that man."

"And ideals grow," said the Knitter. "It is like the pattern seen by Moses on the Mount of Vision. The pattern became a tabernacle, the tabernacle the temple, the temple the church, and all was like a chart of heaven. A man may do what he sees."

The golden snuff-box gleamed as they passed it round. Then the speaker of the society rapped on the table, and the snuff-box vanished from sight, and all was still.

Humboldt arose, king-decorated. Why did he thus appear? He loved plants—the blooming earth. Was it not as noble to love birds—the singing world?

The "little apothecary" had studied the stars from the crystal heights of the Andes. He would one day view them from the Ural and Altai Mountains. It was plants that had showed him the way.

The Knitter and the boy went out, and the good woman dropped these golden words on the crimsoned twilight air:

"The little apothecary? He can who thinks he can."

"If he do perfect work," answered Audubon. "Such work I will do—there lies the merit."

Self-Examination†

THE study of the inner life becomes the duty of every thoughtful soul. Introspection may sometimes be harmful, but again it is in some cases indispensable.

*From In the Days of Audubon; a Tale of the Protector of Birds, by Hezekiah Butterworth; the picturesque story of the life and work of the great naturalist. Finely illustrated by Clinedinst and others. Pp. 236, cloth binding. Price $1.50. D. Appleton & Co., New York, publishers.

†From The Inner Life. A study in Christian Experience. By Bishop John H. Vincent. An exceedingly helpful and interesting little volume of seventy-two pages. Cloth covers. Published by the United Society of Christian Endeavor, Boston and Chicago.

There are three forms of introspection.

The first is scientific. Large service is rendered in these days by the students of what is called "the new psychology," who as psychologists and physiologists investigate normal and morbid conditions and seek to know society the better through the study of the individual.

The immediate object of such self-scrutiny is educational. It promotes the habit of attention, which is more difficult when fixed upon one's own self in his interior processes, and all the more valuable when it is at all successful. This habit cultivates the analytic power; measures one's own intellectual quality; aids in the study of literature; contributes to the better education of the morbid, unfortunate, and vicious representatives of the race; tends to self-culture; broadens the fields of consciousness; and increases their extent and the student's command of them; and there is no process by which one's own soul is so stimulated to self-activity and productiveness.

Self-scrutiny has a religious value. One may thus increase his interest in both ethical and spiritual phenomena, test his personal and religious condition, protect himself, if his work be wisely wrought, against self-deception, develop sympathy with other people, and increase his power to harmonize and discharge the varied duties which his multiplied relations impose. There may be utter selfishness in religious self-examination. This is especially the danger if it be conducted under pressure of fear and superstition or of excessive personal solicitude. Dr. Horace Bushnell, in a very able sermon, warns against the unprofitable type of religious self-scrutiny. He says that generally "in noting things that pass in us we have only a look at the huddle of their transition." He condemns the man who is "always boring into one's life," who is always trying to "study and cipher over himself"; and he wisely makes appeal in behalf of discrimination, and insists upon prayer to God that his Holy Spirit may examine and reveal us to ourselves.

In self-examination we may detect movements, tendencies, and prevailing forces within us. We may study chains of association by which we are led from step to step through a given mental process. We may learn how our sentiments and moral faculties are affected by both fact and fancy. We may compare personal impressions and experiences with others who, engaging in the same studies, seek to know themselves.

It was the habit of the old Stoic Sextus, as he went to his bed at night, to ask of himself, "What evil thing have I conquered this day? what vice resisted? or in what way might I have become a better man?" Seneca tells how at night his wife would keep silent while he for a time looked back over the day, calling up his deeds, hiding nothing from himself, remembering the words he had spoken; and he insisted that we should daily compel the soul to give an account of itself. He says: "Anger will cease or become more moderate which knows it will daily have to come before a judge. What then more beautiful than this habit of beating out a whole day? What a sleep is that which furnishes opportunity for such an examination! How tranquil and profound and free when the soul has thus been commended and admonished!" The day has not yet gone by when wise Christians may learn useful lessons from wise pagans.

Reaching the Christless Millions

THE VOLUNTEERS OF AMERICA AND THEIR SPLENDID RECORD DURING THE PAST YEAR—THE ANNUAL RALLY

ARNEGIE HALL, New York, was the scene of a large and representative gathering on the evening of November 12, the occasion being the annual meeting of the Volunteers of America. Gen. Ballington Booth delivered an address, in which he gave a comprehensive account of the work of the organization during the past year.

In their outdoor work, the Volunteers reached 1,864,951 persons, and through their indoor meetings, 1,241,567 persons lated several instances of unusual misery and poverty where the sufferers had been relieved.

One starving family of seven persons were found, who were in such desperate straits that the children readily consented to sell their baby sister for "something to eat." His recital of these cases touched the sympathies of the audience deeply.

Mrs. Maud Booth, "the Little Mother," followed in an eloquent address. She told of being in touch with over 20,000 prisoners, 2,000 of whom had already passed through their Hope Halls, and of this heard the Gospel. The agencies through which these people were reached raised in their own support during the year $81,012.65. The Volunteers have five branches of philanthropic work. Through their sociological branches, they have received 234,814 men, and fed some 371,297 persons at a nominal cost. This does not include the thousands who have been fed on holiday occasions. Through the House of Mercy branch, 348 women have been helped and cared for, while through the Volunteer tenement work, recently started, 1,563 families have been visited, and over 4,500 helped with food and clothing. Through the Volunteer Prison League, in thirteen State Prisons, 12,000 members have been enrolled, while over 2,000 have graduated from Hope Halls, 75 per cent. of whom are known to be doing well.

GEN. BALLINGTON BOOTH

He then spoke of the tenement work done by the officers in the field among the suffering poor of the metropolis, and re-

2,000, 75 per cent. were doing well and keeping their vows of reform. From coming in contact with the convicts, she learns of their wives, their mothers, and their children; and the homes and lives of all are brightened by the love and sympathy held out to them.

She cited many remarkable instances of hearts won to Christ and sinful lives transformed through the instrumentality of the prison work. One specially notable case was related in which an unfortunate erring girl and her brother, an ex-prisoner, were both won, the girl to-day being a noble Christian woman and the man an earnest "saver of souls."

Letters were read from President Roosevelt, Mayor-elect Low, W. E. Dodge, and others, expressing the warmest sympathy with the work of the Volunteers. Several thousand dollars were contributed by the audience in aid of the work of the organization.

Chinese Fidelity

MANY incidents are quoted in a recent letter from Dr. Ross, of Moukden, in China, of the courage of Chinese converts in the face of death. He says that when the Boxers went to Wang-ching-men, they found fourteen Christians, all of whom they put to death. They knew that they could save their lives by renouncing Christianity, but not one of them did so. "There was no weak one among them. They bore witness to the truth. One, Wang, was singing and praying up to the moment when he was beheaded. One old man, Swin, formerly of considerable influence in the village, but one whom we all considered a weak member, was apprehended and bound. The crowd of beholders appealed to him to save his life. Why should he continue in the Jesus religion? 'Let him bend the knee and crave their forgiveness.' 'No,' he replied, 'I cannot. The Jesus religion is true. What of my life? The religion I possess is an everlasting inheritance.' He continued preaching the truth in which he believed till he was beheaded.

"At Sin-pin-pu, Deacon Chang was seized, and asked to recant or die. He refused in any way to deny the faith, and was beheaded. Swin Haining was brought before the Boxers, and asked whether he was a Jesus religion man. He thereupon began to preach to them the religion in which he believed, and for his 'impudence' was beheaded. Twelve other members of his family died with him for their faith, which they would not renounce.

"Mrs. Hia, of Yungling, one of the ablest women I have seen in Manchuria, was taken. She would not renounce the faith. She asked time to pray, according to the custom of her religion. She had a napkin on her head, on account of some sickness. This she took off, and knelt, praying for some time. She then stood up and sang a hymn, 'At the Gate of Heaven'; and while singing with all her heart, she was beheaded."

A Railway to Mecca

As an illustration of the progress the East is making in civilized methods, the National Geographic Magazine gives these facts concerning the new Damascus and Mecca Railway: The first section of the road was opened in September. Thousands of spectators had gathered at Mezireh in the early morning. The governor-general of Syria, accompanied by sheiks, ulemas, and prominent men of Damascus, boarded the railway carriages, which were decked with Turkish flags, and the train moved off amid the shouts of the enthusiastic Mussulmen. The arrival of the train at the other end of the section, Dera, was likewise greeted by an immense crowd. The Sultan, in his palace on the Bosphorus, 1,000 miles away, meanwhile was receiving bulletins telling of the successful opening of the railroad. Much importance is given by the Turkish papers of the capital to the construction of this route. They credit the Sultan with originating the plan, and state that as soon as the connections between Damascus and Mecca and Medina are completed, he will push the road northward to connect with the Anatolian railway to Constantinople. It will bind together the provinces from Constantinople to the Gulf of Aden.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Dec. 25

1. Who are the "unnamed persons" of the Bible and where are their names to be found?

2. Is it warmer at any time north of the equator, than south of it, and if so what is the cause?

3. How did the term "Blue Book," applied to certain Government publications, originate, and what colors do various countries employ in issuing their "Blue Books"?

4. What is the best method of curing a child of a stubborn disposition?

5. If a man, who is engaged in a business that is injurious to the public, is converted late in life, should he continue to retain the fortune he made in it, or is he bound to beggar himself by relinquishing all that he possesses?

Questions of the Week

1. Is it not equally murder in the sight of God for a man to kill another in war or in private life?

Whether the killing of a man in private life or in war is equally murder, or murder at all in God's sight, depends on the circumstances. There is only one case in which it is right for a man to kill a fellow-man in private life, and that is in defence of one's own, or another's life. Other than this, God denounces, as in the case of Cain killing Abel, or David putting Uriah in the front of battle. While God says no murderer shall inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, he plainly upholds war for a just and righteous cause. (See Joshua 6:17, 21; Judges 7:22, and others.) Therefore, killing men in war is not necessarily murder in God's sight. It is the nature of the case, which may make either one more wicked than the other.

CORA H. MACQUEEN.

While war is essentially wrong, and only to be tolerated as the necessary extremity of conditions, it is still not equally wrong to go to war and to kill in private feuds. In private life, men may ordinarily have protection by the law, while nations must sometimes go into war, just as an executioner discharges the painful duty that ends a man's life. A soldier in battle is not only authorized, but is required by the very oath of his service, to act as an agent of the country under whose flag he serves. The death he causes is not a murder, but an execution. But as we are sometimes to suffer rather than do violence in private life, in order to be Christians, so it is the duty of Christians to strive to hasten the day when nations will be able to settle differences in a civilized way rather than by the barbarism of war.

C. P. ATKINSON.

2. Are some children naturally born more bright than others? Is there such a quality as inherited or inborn genius, or is it merely the result of culture, environment, and a right direction of individual tastes and predilections?

Undoubtedly some children are born more bright than others. Many have to labor intensely to master principles that others acquire almost by instinct. If genius was acquired, not born, no pupil would ever reach beyond the precepts of his teacher, and society would remain stationary, if it did not retrograde, which is not the case. It is inborn, not acquired genius, that shines forth so brightly in Galileo, Newton, Cuvier, Agassiz, Jefferson, Michael Angelo, and scores of others who have soared above their surroundings and environments. In general, history records that great men have risen not from high places and opportunities and special training, but from humblest surroundings.

Lincoln from the rail-pile, Grant from the tan-yard, Greeley from the farm, Franklin from the tallow-tank, Edison from the telegraph, Gross from the street arabs and thousands of others too numerous to mention. Nearly all the great men of history have blazed forth almost instantly, not as the climax of a life of careful preparation, but from conditions that in general indicate, we may say, an instinctive intuition.

WM. W. CASE.

That there are the greatest inequalities in natural gifts, of every kind, is daily attested by the evidence of our senses. It is well known that, while good breeding and culture can do much towards refining harsh features, they can not confer absolute beauty; and, in like manner, though favorable environment and careful education can do much to develop mediocre abilities, yet the same training would have had greater fruits if applied to greater natural powers. There are, of course, numberless things, in a world like ours, to arrest the development of genius, to thwart and counteract it; too often we see "Pegasus in pound," doing the drudgery of the world, with abilities unrecognized and ineffectual; while mediocrity, with its one talent sedulously improved, fortuitously well-sped, bears the palm of the world's honor. Thus is the Scripture verified—"There are first which shall be last, and the last shall be first."

HELEN E. MALONE.

3. Where the author of a historical novel introduces in his book Bible characters and events, does it tend to increase or decrease reverence for the sacred Word?

We believe the introduction of Biblical characters into novels has a tendency to decrease reverence. Certainly, it strongly confuses truth and fiction in the mind of the reader. A man who is not a close Bible student will recall the account of Christ's healing of the lepers and other incidents of Christ's life upon earth, and be doubtful as to how much of his knowledge he owes to the Gospel narrative and how much to the novel. We cannot see how inventing conversations between Bible characters, or making them converse with imaginary characters, can tend to increase reverence for the Word of God.

E. B. VAN VALZAH.

Reverence for the Bible need not be violated if, first, the motive of the author be pure; second, his conception sufficiently lofty, and third, his power of delineation just and accurate. When an author measures up to these three conditions, respect for the Bible may not only be maintained, but interest awakened in the closer study of its own pages and life stories, unparalleled for beauty, sweetness and strength of style; should he fail in either of the first two particulars, the tendency would necessarily be to lower the Bible in the esteem of the general reader. If this standard is true, the introduction of the Deity is, therefore, forbidden or impossible of entire success, on the ground that however pure the motive, human conception and delineation should stagger at the presumption and shrink in modesty from the appalling task-fore-ordained failure.

AMELIA FERRETT.

4. Where can rich people do the greater amount of good to mankind: in founding libraries, where books and newspapers are cheap and abundant; or in building comfortable cottages, in the place of the miserable tenements, which nurture ignorance and crime in the cities?

If I had a large amount of money which I wished to dedicate to the service of mankind, I would not build or endow public libraries to any great extent. In this age literature is so cheap that a person of very moderate means can have almost whatever he wants. Besides, a book bought and owned is better every way than one borrowed. More than this, while the free library no doubt helps very many, it certainly puts a premium on useless or injurious literature. Examine the records of any public library and see the preponderance of fiction that is read, as against all other kinds of books, and you will probably be in doubt as to whether, upon the whole, the free library is not more of a bane than a blessing. A far better outlet for philanthropy, in my judgment, would be the building of good homes, which people could have for a nominal rent; and the building or endowing of public baths and wash-houses, where people would have a chance to cultivate the habit of cleanliness. I have known cases in which dirty surroundings fostered the habit of reading trash; it was such a relief to escape from the real to the ideal. More comfort and cleanliness, with less trashy romance, would be a boon to this age.

JOSEPH HAMILTON.

If each plan is put into operation separately, more good will, as a rule, be accomplished by the former than by the latter, because a library may influence, proportionally, such a vast number of people, for example, $100 invested for the betterment of some poor family's condition, would benefit that one family only, while $100, if invested in a library, might benefit a thousand. Again, if good books are placed within reach of the poor and needy, they will, according to the general rule, receive such wholesome inspiration from their reading, as will enable them to work out their own destiny better than before. Finally, I believe that a happy co-operation of the two methods would work the greatest miracle for bettering the conditions of the unfortunate.

O. S. J.

[A very large number of answers to this question have been received. Ninety per cent. of the writers contend that money invested in building homes produces better results than in establishing libraries.—Ed.]

5. May we expect that the world will be converted before the second coming of Christ?

Our faith in God should lead us to believe that the world will be converted before Christ comes. To believe otherwise would imply the thought of such a failure in God's plans as is inconceivable. I am aware that the predictions in the Epistles and the Revelation appear to favor the opposite view, but perhaps they were not intended to be accepted literally. One reason for thinking so, is that they imply battle and wholesale destruction of Christ's enemies, which is inconsistent with his character. The conversion of the world seems an achievement so stupendous as to be impossible; but so did the situation to-day seem to be nineteen hundred years ago. Who could have thought that the little company of a hundred and twenty unlettered, obscure men and women, who gathered together after Christ's death, would grow into the enormous number who to-day own him as their Lord? The influence of Christian nations is growing at a prodigious rate, and it is not inconceivable that, when it culminates, there may be such an outpouring of the Holy Spirit that millions will be brought into the kingdom in a year. God is not willing that any should perish, and I believe that, having undertaken the work of redemption, he will succeed in his own way and time, and that eventually there will be a generation which shall be entirely Christian, and there will be a time when every knee shall bow, and every tongue own Jesus as Lord.

L. E. C.

No! We need not expect to see the world converted before the Lord's return. This is the age of the Gentiles. The age during which God is seeking out a people for his name. The calling out of the church to become the bride of his Son (Acts. 15:14). Again, the conditions which the word of God describes to precede his coming, are not what we would find in a converted nation. His disciples asked him for a sign of his coming. He did not tell them, when you see a converted world. No. His answer was:—"Ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars," "Nation shall rise against nation," "Love of many shall wax cold," "False prophets shall arise, and deceive many," "As the days of Noah were," etc. (Matt. 24:34-41). Again, Paul speaks of the great apostasy which shall mark the time of the end; also of the Antichrist, the man of sin (II. Thess. 2:3; I. Tim. 4:1. See also I. John 2:18). Remember, "All these are the beginning of sorrows," Christ's coming will bring with it the Millennial reign. He will introduce the age, when nations will beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning-hooks (Isa. 2:2-4). This seems to have been the view of the primitive church. It has among its many able supporters, Dean Alford, Prof. Delitzsch, Dr. Tregelles, and Dr. Bonar.

Miscellaneous Questions

Reader, Newark, N. J. Why do we say in the Lord's Prayer, "Lead us not into temptation?" Why should we suppose God would do this?

It is a prayer for support and deliverance when we are tempted. Another translation reads, "Bring us not into temptation." Dean Alford gives still another translation, "Leave (or abandon) us not in temptation"—which probably conveys the meaning intended more clearly than the terms used by earlier translators.

Reader, Harlem, New York. Why do not all Christian newspapers and people use the divinely inspired name of Sabbath for the first day of the week instead of the Pagan name of Sunday?

The name, Lord's Day, is better than either, because it suggests the real reason of keeping that day sacred. We observe it because we wish to honor our Lord, who, on that day of the week, completed his redemptive work by rising from the dead. The word Sabbath is misleading, because it conveys the idea only of rest, which was an appropriate name for the Jewish institution, but does not fitly characterize the Christian sacred day, which is one of service and spiritual activity. If all Christians made the first day of the week a day of unbroken rest, there would be a grievous decrease in the prosperity of Christ's church. They do not keep Sabbath, but are found in the house of worship, in the Sunday School, or distributing tracts, or doing something to advance Christ's cause.

Inquirer. At what time in Israel's history was the cloudy pillar taken away?

According to the best commentators it was with them during the whole period of their sojourn in the wilderness and was withdrawn when no longer needed to guide them. There is no mention made in Scripture of the time of its withdrawal.

Mrs. E. R. D., Lampasas, Tex., writes:

It makes me sorry to think the rich are so blind as to think they are doing good work in giving thousands to build libraries. If they would build homes for poor widows, or give to the poor, how much more acceptable it would be to God.

Our correspondent takes too narrow a view of the matter. Multiplied opportunities for education are among the most hopeful signs of the age.

Rev. H. V. W., Elk Park, N. C. It is totally unnecessary.

B. J. G., Towanda, Pa. The phenomena of dreams and the influences that control our sleeping hours form too large a subject to dismiss in a paragraph. Read up on the subject in some good encyclopedia.

A committee of the United Mine Workers of America, at Merceline, Mo., writes that at a recent meeting resolutions of sympathy were adopted on the death of President McKinley and forwarded to Mrs. McKinley.

Anxious One, Westville, N. J. Not only is our Government doing all it can for Miss Stone's release, but the Christian people of America are praying for her, and have subscribed largely toward her ransom.

Reader, Belmont, N. Y. It is a husband's duty to provide for the material wants of his household, and if, having the means, he declines to do so, he can be compelled by law to make such fixed provision as may seem proper.

S. H. C. There is no need to change your prayer because of your bereavement. You pray for others, as well as for yourself. There are doubtless some whom you know and whom you can remember in your daily petitions.

D. M. S., Lexington, Mo. A true Christian will not willingly inflict pain upon any of God's creatures, even the least. Wanton slaughter of fowl, fish, deer and other animals for the mere love of sport is to be condemned.

E. M. G., Osceola, Ia. Marriages of persons holding different religious faiths are apt to turn out unhappily. It is "an unequal yoke," the strain of which few natures can stand. It seems to us that the objections are well founded.

Reader. 1. Flags are half-masted for mourning. 2. It is quite customary in times of public mourning, to drape and display the national flag even on private buildings. 3. With God nothing is impossible. 4. No remains of Noah's ark now exist.

Treasurer John Muntz, of the Venezuela Mission, in acknowledging receipt of a contribution to the mission's work, writes: "We are truly grateful for your continued fellowship, and thank our Father in heaven for all these tokens of his good hand upon us."

John Haussmann. 1. Dr. Talmage's sermons are published in German by Philip Pickel, Hamburg. 2. A lie told for financial gain in business is a lie, even if it is told without intent to injure. Yet if it deceives and defrauds, we cannot understand how it can be called "innocent."

Mrs. P. Napperton, Ont., Can. The passage in Matt. 12:44, "which, when a man hath found, he hideth," etc., implies that his desire to possess the treasure is such that he will take no risks; therefore, adopting the world's wisdom, "he hides it again and keeps his discovery a secret until he has bought the field." If the owner of the field knew that it contained a treasure, he would not sell it, but would claim all it contained as his, and the discoverer of the treasure would have nothing for his pains.

Twice Told Tales.

No Meat Extracted from them by Some who most Need the Facts.

We have more than twice, told the reader of the fact that he or she may perhaps easily discover the cause of the daily ill-feeling and the experiment is not difficult to make.

But there are readers who think truths are for some one else, and not for themselves.

Some day the oft told fact will flash upon upon us as applicable when the knowledge comes home, that day after day of inconvenience and perhaps suffering has been endured, the cause not being recognized or believed, although we may have been told of the cause many times over, but never believed it applied to us.

It would startle a person to know how many people suffer because they drug themselves daily with coffee. We repeat it, it is a powerful drug, and so affects the delicate nervous system that disease may appear in any part of the body, all parts being dependent for health, on a healthy nervous system.

Relief from coffee for 30 days has relieved thousands of people who never suspected the cause of their troubles.

The use of Postum Food Coffee is of great benefit to such, as it goes to work directly to rebuild the delicate cell structures from the elements nature selects for the work. Relief from a heavy drug and the taking of proper nourishment is the true and only permanent method.

HORSE BUCKED.

Rider Severely Hurt.

A Cincinnati man visiting in Texas, on a ranch, was thrown from a horse and so severely injured that his life was despaired of. He takes pride in telling how food saved his life. The heavy drugs given seriously injured his stomach and as he says "It seemed I would soon have to starve in the midst of plenty. My stomach refused to digest food and I ran down from 165 to 133 pounds. When my appetite failed I was ready to give up, and it looked as though I would soon 'wink out.'"

One morning the foreman's daughter brought in what she called a splendid food and it turned out to be Grape-Nuts. A little skeptical I ate it and found it was good, and just the kind of food I could keep on my stomach which had been almost burned out by the vile drugs.

I felt that I had obtained a new lease of life for improvement set in at once. A week later I was weighed and had gained two pounds. My weight has since steadily increased by the constant use of Grape-Nuts, and I am now better than I have been in years, as my friends will all testify.

In all kinds of athletic sports I notice I have a greater reserve force than formerly, for which I am indebted to Grape-Nuts. Taken in moderation it is the greatest food of its kind in the world, being equally well adapted to athletes and invalids." Paul Alwin Platz, 1906 Biglow Ave., Mt. Auburn, Cincinnati, O.

The Right Use of Ability*

Example and Service Required of Men Endowed with Talents

MEN attain a new dignity when viewed from the standpoint of Solomon, who said that "the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord." That is to say, that God reveals himself to the world by the light he has kindled in the souls of certain men. Inspiration is the light that has shone on the world revealing the way to God. We see God in man more or less clearly, and in the person of Christ we have "the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Men who are too obtuse to see God in nature, too ignorant, or too prejudiced, or too lazy to seek knowledge of him in his Word, are still not without the light, because they have before them men who are to a certain extent incarnations of him, men who live by the light and life he gives them, and who are reflections of his image. The image is often marred, often defective, for, alas, the mirror is covered with the dust of the world's highways, and is seamed and flawed with its own inherent defects. But even so, the image is visible and we know that the lives and characters that we see are luminous with a light not their own.

Christ's conception of his church was that it should have the cleansing and preserving quality of salt, and that it should give light to the world. Men were not to be saved for themselves. They are saved that they may save others. When the Christian is really in earnest, when he is a consecrated man, intent on doing all in his power for his Lord—then we learn how much can be done by one man to purify his neighborhood and to light his fellows on the way heavenward. So much is expected of every Christian. He should take stock of himself, try to learn what gift or power there is in him that he can use for Christ. If he is only an employee, his work should be so thorough, so conscientious and so well done that he receives the approval and the confidence of his employer. If he is an employer, there ought to be such kindness and consideration in his conduct, that his employees reverence him and hold him in respect. No matter what his station, he ought to set himself to so live that the light within him shall shine in such a way that others will perceive the divine in the human.

In these days of strenuous educational effort, we are liable to forget that the mental power and the talents on which we set so high a value, and the knowledge that we hold in so great esteem, need something more before they can be of real service in the world. Our own national history furnishes examples of men of great ability and of fine education, whose lives seem to have missed the mark. They somehow failed to exert a good influence in their generation. There have been others, too, whose fate has been far worse, in that they have exerted an evil influence. It is but lately that one such man left the world. A man of splendid gifts, logical, eloquent, genial, capable of doing grand service in the world, yet blighting the lives of all who were attracted to him by his wondrous gifts. It is not sufficient for usefulness that we possess power of mind, and have brilliant talents. The Divine touch is needed to give them direction and influence. The gold must be minted and must bear the stamp of the Government before it becomes current coin. There is something awful about the life of a man of transcendent ability, who is doing no useful service, or, worse still, is doing harm with it. Better far be mediocre or inferior, if all the power we do possess is being used in Christ's service. The man who buried his talent in the earth was punished for his idleness, but what would have been the fate of the five-talent man if he had spent his capital in pleasure or riotous indulgence? So, it concerns us rather to see that our ability is rightly and fully employed, than to be envious of those more richly endowed, whose responsibility is proportionately greater.

MY HEART SHALL THANKFUL BE

O H, gladly let my lips enumerate
The joys of earthly sense,
The comfort in the days unfortunate,
And grief's dear recompense.
For good or ill that yet has come to me,
My heart shall thankful be.
With gratitude I think upon the past;
For sunny days—or sad;
The cherished flowers, the chilling winds could blast,
Left sweets to make me glad;
No frost can rob me of their memory,
And I shall thankful be.

With thankful heart I face the coming years—
My Father's at the helm;
My bark is safe—I ride bereft of fears,
For naught can overwhelm.
That I am his, who ruleth earth and sea,
My heart shall thankful be.

Work of the Tombs' Mission

MORE than a quarter of a century ago, a band of Christian men of all denominations, under the lead of the late Dr. Howard Crosby, organized what is known as the Gospel Mission to the Tombs. The aim of this society is to bring the Gospel to men and women in the City Prison. No modern rescue mission work shows such splendid results for the small outlay used to carry it on. In the Tombs Prison where nearly fifteen thousand persons come each year, there are unrivalled opportunities for presenting to men and women the story of redeeming love. During the past year, the Tombs Chaplain was able to secure a pardon for two men in prison. In one of these cases when Governor Odell, after a thorough investigation, signed the man's pardon, the Chaplain went to his house to inform his wife and children. He found them on the verge of starvation, and hoping against hope. When he told them of the pardon, they would hardly believe him. When he showed them the Governor's letter, they wept for joy. The Gospel of Christ and a little human kindness have changed that prisoner's life and transformed his home.

Many cases of conversion among prisoners might be mentioned. The chaplain keeps in touch with these cases by visiting the Penitentiary, Sing Sing, Auburn, and Elmira Reformatory. Recently, he went to Sing Sing and called upon five men with whom he formerly labored in the Tombs. All gave evidence of continued saving grace and the genuineness of the change.

Hundreds of letters come from men, women, and boys, some of whom are now in prison, and others in the outside world where they are living good lives. These letters nearly all show that while in prison the writers decided to live for Christ.

The work of the Tombs Mission is by voluntary contributions. $2,000 are needed to carry it on. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are already familiar with the work and have given it their hearty indorsement.

Contributions may be sent to George E. Sterry, Treasurer, 79 Pine street, New York City. Rev. J. J. Munro, Chaplain of the Tombs, will gladly answer any letters desiring information concerning the mission and its work.

The Story of a Famous Hymn

(See Page 1000)

THE hymn, "Sometime We'll Understand," was one of those sung at President McKinley's funeral in Washington, and since that event, it has had a larger hold upon public interest and affection. Very little is known concerning its author, Rev. Maxwell N. Cornelius, D.D. His name does not appear, so far as the writer can discover, in any biographical book or dictionary of hymnology. To Mr. Hubert P. Main, of Biglow & Main, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is indebted for the following information, gathered by Mr. Main from letters written to himself by members of the Cornelius family. Dr. Cornelius was born July 30, 1842, at Mt. Jackson, Pa. As the result of a severe illness, he became lame when only eighteen. After graduation from the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., 1860, he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Oakdale, Pa., then successively he was the spiritual shepherd of congregations in Altoona, Pa., Pasadena and San Francisco, Cal., and at Washington, D. C., where he died, March 31, 1893. His wife (before her marriage Miss Mary Davidson, of Monongahela, Pa.) preceded him by a year. He wrote several hymns. "Sometime, we'll Understand" was first published in 1891 by Biglow & Main, in Gospel Hymns. It was rendered some years ago at the funeral of the Duke of Clarence, heir to the British throne. During Mr. Sankey's recent visit to Philadelphia, he sang this hymn to an immense audience in Dr. Conwell's Church, giving incidents of its history in the address which preceded it. The hearers were deeply impressed. Although Mr. Ira D. Sankey has now been over thirty years working in the evangelistic field, his marvelous powers of holding an audience by speech or song are enlarged rather than diminished. He addressed mammoth meetings on the same afternoon in Philadelphia. The immense auditorium at the Pennsylvania Railroad Y. M. C. A. was crowded, and hundreds were turned away.

No strength required, a child can operate it.

No more stooping, rubbing, boiling of clothes. Hot water and soap all that is needed. It will wash large quantities of clothes (no matter how soiled) perfectly clean in six minutes. Impossible to injure the most delicate fabrics. Saving in wear and tear of clothes, to say nothing of the saving in soap and materials, pays for machine in a short time. Don't be prejudiced. This is entirely different from, and far superior to any other washing machine ever made.

A DAY'S WASH IN 3 HOURS.

SHERWOOD, Md., Jan. 15, 1901.
The washer I received from you is the best I ever saw. It will do all you claim for it. I can do the washing in three to four hours, where it took a colored woman a whole day to do it. We have ten boys and three girls, and you can judge from that, that we have large washings. Myself and daughter would not part with this machine for twice what it cost. We live on a farm.
MRS. LEVI H. HARRISON.

GREASY OVERALLS WASHED CLEAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Dec. 25, 1899.
1900 WASHER CO.
Gentlemen: I received the washing machine in good order on the 15th inst. My wife had saved three weeks' washing to try it. She commenced washing at seven o'clock, and at eleven all the clothes were on the line. It would have taken two days to do all this work the old way; and the washing was done clean. Greasy overalls, which I use in the engine room, could not have been done better in a steam laundry. She would not part with the washer if she could not get another like it, if she was offered $100.
Yours truly, CHAS. BLUM, Marine Engineer,

15 MACHINESFUL IN 4 HOURS.

CHICAGO, July 13, 1901.
Last week I started to wash with your 1900 Ball-Bearing Washer. A neighbor saw me wash my little boys' waists (which were terribly dirty) and we were both surprised to see there was not a spot left. On Monday we did a big wash of 15 machinesful and the work was done in 4 hours. It is the best machine I ever saw (and I have tried many). It works so easy that my little boy can run it.
MRS. A. H. CENTER, 636 Diversey Boulevard.

IT IS A WONDER.

SAVANNAH YACHT CLUB, SAVANNAH, GA., Jan. 21, 1901.
After a thorough trial of your 1900 Washer on all kinds of washing, I think you have a "wonder." We have a very large washing, and have always had two women on Monday and one to finish on Tuesday. Our washing cost us $10 per month. With your washing machine, our cook and the yard boy did the washing in 4 hours, much better than it was done before. Your washer is all you claim for it.

ISRAEL'S PROVERB

An Ancient Aphorism with a Modern Application : : :

By MRS. M. BAXTER

SOME people in Israel being anxious to vindicate themselves, used a proverb implying that their sufferings were not a punishment for their own sins but for those of their fathers. They said: "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." So Ezekiel was instructed to set them right on this subject and to assure them that God did not punish any man for his father's sin, but for his own. He went further and declared that if the son of a bad father avoided his father's ways and lived a good life, he would not be reproached for his father's misconduct. Therefore, they were forbidden to use the proverb.

The fact was that Israel did not know how to repent. The people wanted a religion which demanded no repentance, and a deliverance which demanded no walk with God. They, who were chosen to be separate from the nations, had much more in common with the nations than with their God.

A religion without true repentance towards God: a religion in which there shall be no broken heart, no immediate contact with the living God in which all contact with God shall be second-hand: this suits the fallen, perverted, natural heart of man: but this is always idolatry in one form or other. Some thing or some person is put in the place of God—a priest, if not an idol. And the enmity of the natural heart comes out in the spirit which prevails, and which dares to blame and to criticise God, and to cast on him the responsibility of its own sin. How often we hear in our own day some thoughtless, irreverent, ignorant young man say, "God made me as I am: if he chose to make me with sinful tendencies, it is his doing if I sin, when it is my nature which leads me to it. I cannot help it." It was this same spirit which was prevalent in the land of Israel when the proverb was common among them: "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge" (Ezek. 18:2).

How God searched out and exposed the sin of his people by his prophet Ezekiel! And yet we find this man never setting himself up as anything superior to his people, never bringing his person into view,—only a yielded instrument at all times, to the God he served, and to the people who so little understood either him or his God. "The word of the Lord came to me again, saying, What mean ye that ye use this proverb concerning the land of Israel . . . As I live, saith the Lord God, ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb in Israel. Behold, all souls are mine. As the soul of the father, so the soul of the son is mine: the soul that sinneth, it shall die" (vers. 1-4). "All souls are mine"; each one responsible to me for his own sin: he cannot get rid of his individual responsibility to me, as his maker, in whose hand his breath is (Dan. 5:23); whom he should glorify. It is an awful sin for man to charge God with the responsibility for his sins.

"Have I any pleasure in the death of the wicked? saith the Lord God; and not rather that he should turn from his way and live?" This is the central point. God's people have reproached him as unjust and cruel, he asserts himself as possessor of those who understand him so little; and he asks, how should I have any pleasure in the destruction of what belongs to me? Should I rejoice in the loss of what is mine? "Yet ye say, the way of the Lord is not equal. Hear now, O house of Israel: Is not my way equal? are not your ways unequal?" Is it not the crookedness of your ways which disables you from seeing my ways aright? When the righteous turns away from his righteousness to commit sin, he shall die; when the wicked turns from his sin, I provide him a way back; he is not obliged to continue in sin; he shall live. What have you to find fault with? "Therefore will I judge you, O house of Israel, every one according to his ways, saith the Lord God."

But this is not the last word of him who has said, "Israel is my son, my firstborn." His heart yearns over his wicked, rebellious, unrepentant people, and he pleads with them: "Return ye and turn yourselves from all your transgressions; so iniquity shall not be your ruin. Cast away from you all your transgressions, wherein ye have transgressed; and make you a new heart and a new spirit: for why will ye die, O house of Israel?" How unlike the character which popular opinion gave to their long-suffering God was the Father-heart which yearned over them! But how should they make themselves a new heart and a new spirit? All that is required of them is to return; he will do the rest. And the sequel we have in Jer. 31:31-34, when they return (vers. 17-21), and when he promises that he will put his law within their hearts; and in Ezek. 36:24-30, when he will cleanse them from their sins, and create within them a new heart and a new spirit. "For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves, and live."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

The usual five new questions are omitted this week, in order that other letters to "The Mail-Bag," many of them long delayed, may receive attention. Hereafter, once a month, the entire page will be devoted to this class of letters.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

Dr. S. N. —, San Diego, Cal. Was the body in which Christ appeared to his disciples the identical body he had before the crucifixion? Was it a material or a spiritual body?

The fact that the tomb was found empty implies that it was the same body. There is confirmation also in the fact that it bore the wounds inflicted at the crucifixion (See John 20: 27). That it was a material body is distinctly asserted. "A spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have" (See Luke 24: 39). It must, however, be inferred that some change had been wrought in it by the experience it had passed through. It suddenly vanished on one occasion (See Luke 24: 31). It entered the room, the doors being shut (See John 20: 19). It appeared at places widely separated at short intervals. The material body had apparently been spiritualized and freed from material needs and limitations.

R. P., Va. Is it true that a man, by visiting a saloon, injures his influence?

Unquestionably. No one who values the respect of his fellowmen or who wishes to exert a moral influence in the community in which he lives, will visit such places. A man is known by the company he keeps.

W. S. R., Linwood, N. Y. 1. Why should there be so much difference between Christ's teachings (Matt. 5: 44) and David's prayers for the destruction of his enemies (Psalm 83: 17 and 104: 35)? 2. Is a man or a nation justified in praying for the destruction of enemies in peace or war?

1. It was under a different dispensation. Christ came to introduce a better order of things in which vindictive feelings have no place. David regarded his enemies as the enemies of God, as indeed they were. There was no hope of their reformation, and he prayed as an impulsive man for their destruction as the best thing that could happen. But even he was capable of an act of magnanimity (see I. Samuel 26: 10, 11). There were many things said and done under the Mosaic economy that would be wrong in the light that Christ brought. 2. A man or a nation would be justified in praying that the schemes of an enemy might fail, that he might be defeated, but no Christian would rejoice over a great slaughter of the enemy, nor be justified in praying for it. The Christian spirit would rather lead him to pray that the enemy might become a friend.

L. G. B., Lynn, Mass. Are we to understand from Isa. 65: 17 that in heaven we shall forget our former life and friends?

No, the passage implies an absence of desire. The conditions will be so much better that there will be no longing for the old. A man raised out of poverty or uncongenial surroundings would not absolutely forget his past, but he would not dwell upon it, but would rejoice in his better condition. All analogy and all that we are told of the future life points to the recognition of friends and the remembrance of the mercies and blessings of the former existence.

S. S. Teacher, Scranton, Pa. What is the teaching of the Parable of the Unjust Steward (Luke 16: 1-9)? How could Christ commend a course so dishonest?

It was not Christ who commended the steward, but the steward's lord, and he evidently praised him for his sharp practice, not for his dishonesty. It was a shrewd thing to do. Christ's object in giving the parable appears to have been to show that money might be so used in helping others that the benefactor would receive a hearty welcome on entering heaven from those he had helped. As the debtors would feel so grateful to the steward for reducing their debts that they would support him when he became poor, so the poor who had been helped in this life would be grateful in heaven to those who had benefited them.

J. B. D., West Point, Va. What were the names of the wise men who followed the star to Bethlehem?

Tradition gives them as Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthasar. There appears to be no historical basis for them. Other traditions about them are to the effect that the Apostle Thomas found the men later during a preaching tour in Parthia and baptized them. Some make them Persians and give Zoroaster as the authority for associating the star with the birth of a king; others attribute it to a tradition handed down from Seth, the son of Adam.

Subscriber, Philadelphia. 1. In Luke 4: 23, Christ refers to the proverb, "Physician, heal thyself." I would like to know the author of the quotation and how old it is. 2. Who is the author of Lincoln's favorite poem, "O, Why Should the Spirit of Mortal be Proud?"

1. It is very ancient, probably as old as the earliest proverbial philosophy, and current in all civilized lands. In Galilee, it seems to have been a proverb quite as familiar as our "Charity begins at home," etc. 2. The author was William Knox, a Scottish poet (1789-1825).

C. N., Huscher, Kans. 1. Why is the 119th Psalm divided in so strange a way? 2. What is the meaning of the word Selah?

1. It has been called the Golden A. B. C. because each part has the heading of a letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Each part contains eight verses, and in the Hebrew each verse begins with the letter at the head of the part. It has been suggested that it was written for the pilgrims to sing as they traveled toward Jerusalem to keep the feasts. The following Psalms called, "The Songs of Degrees," took its place when the pilgrims came in sight of the Holy City. Ruskin says that his mother made him learn the Psalm and he found it withering condemnation. That good results have come from the act, is no defence. The quality of an act is not determined by its consequences. Even if the Jews who clamored for his death, and Pilate who condemned him, could have foreseen the good that would ensue, their conduct would have been wicked; for men must not do evil that good may come. But they had no such thought. The Jews hated Christ; and Pilate, from corrupt motives, gratified them, and both were responsible for their acts. Christ distinctly marked the responsibility in the case of Judas (See Matt. 26: 24) while recognizing the prediction. Human laws take the same view. If you were to murder a man so wicked that his death would be a relief to his family and his neighborhood, you would be held guilty of murder and probably be hanged. How much more when the victim was the pure and holy Saviour!

R. C. G., Barnard, N. C. If the earthly parents of our Lord were first cousins, why do some of our Legislatures and some churches forbid first cousins assuming the marriage relation?

There is nothing in the New Testament to indicate that Joseph and Mary were first cousins. If there were, it would prove nothing, as the churches do not regard Joseph as the father of our Lord. The case of Moses is more in point (see Ex. 6: 20), but Moses made such marriages as that of his own parents, illegal. The objections to the marriage of first cousins are usually based on physiological grounds, and these are disputed. The assertion that the children of such marriages are invariably mentally and physically inferior is not borne out by statistics.

Mrs. M. J. Wiggins, Denver, Col., writes: Spare the birds! How I love them! I never adorn my hat with their feathers. No good people would follow such a wicked fashion.

M. A. H., Charleston, S. C. What is the meaning of the passage, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God?"

If M. A. H. will glance at the heading of the new serial, "The Needle's Eye," which now appearing in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the explanation will probably be grasped more readily. The small wicket in the middle of a city gate was called in Eastern nomenclature, "the needle's eye." After the large gate was closed for the night, the smaller wicket was left open, but so narrow was it that a camel before entering, had to be unloaded and the it must needs stoop low. So, in the reference in the text quoted, the lesson conveyed is that it is exceedingly difficult for the rich and proud to enter at the "strait gate" of righteousness; to do so, they must cast off all burdens and become like the meek and lowly Master.

Mrs. M. E. F., Morristown, N. J. Do the Quakers believe in the Trinity and that our Lord Jesus is equal with God?

They hold the same views in common with all the orthodox churches on the essentials of Christian doctrine. They do not use the word "Trinity," yet they believe in the threefold Deity—Father, Son and Holy Ghost one God and co-equal. They accept all that Scripture teaches regarding the offices of Christ and his redeeming and atoning mission. They believe in the resurrection, the judgment and the immortality of the soul.

Mrs. S. G., Atlantic, Ia. Is there any State in the Union where women can lawfully vote at the Presidential elections? I am positive there is and that in Colorado, Utah and Wyoming women can and do vote. In the last few months several have been incredulous when I made that statement, and three different voters—men who claim to be well informed—have said that in some States women might vote at municipal elections, but they were positive no woman had ever voted for Presidential electors or in one ever had, the vote had never been counted.

You are right. In Colorado, Idaho, Utah and Wyoming women have full suffrage, and can vote for all officers, including presidential electors.

A. R., New Lexington, O., sends this novel proposition:

Why not let the man who drinks pay the taxes? A total abstainer has no right to help pay the expense caused by drinking. Tax the manufacturer of the liquors and he will tax the retail dealer, and he will in turn tax the man who does the drinking, and he is the man who should pay the bill, is he not?

Mavy, St. Louis, Mo. In Presbyterian churches, who, besides the members, are entitled to partake of the Lord's Supper?

Those who are in good standing as members of other Protestant churches (with which the Presbyterian Church holds fellowship), and who may happen to be away from their own church home at the time, are usually invited to partake, if so disposed. This invitation is now extended in the churches of several other denominations.

H. P. C., Nebraska, Ind. Is it not inconsistent to condemn those who crucified Christ, while admitting that if he had not died, all mankind would have been lost?

No, there is nothing inconsistent in the two positions. The execution of Christ was a cruel, unjust, barbarous thing, utterly inexcusable and therefore worthy of the most cal grounds, and these are disputed. The assertion that the children of such marriages are invariably mentally and physically inferior is not borne out by statistics.

Constant Reader, Hartford, Ont. If, as statistics show, there is in hot climates a greater prevalence of crime, suicides, etc., must we not infer that man is not entirely responsible for his conduct?

Man is certainly responsible, because he has the power to control his impulses. Many in all climates do not use the power, and some seem to have lost it and in others it has not been developed. The fault is due more to lack of training in childhood than to climate. Where the impulses and passions are strong, as they frequently are in the inhabitants of the tropics, there is the greater need for exercising self-control, but no man can be released from responsibility on such grounds. Everyone knows when he commits a crime that it is within his power to refrain from committing it. People sometimes say that they cannot help doing this or that, that they cannot resist the impulse, but when such statements are true, we regard them simply as signs of an unregulated moral nature and the excuse does not weigh with judge or jury. All our social principles are based on the consciousness that men can and ought to control their impulses and passions. There is, unhappily, in all, that condition so pathetically described in Rom. 7: 15-23, in which men do the things that they hate and the good that they would they

CANNIBALS BROUGHT TO CHRIST

How Consecrated Missionary Effort is Civilizing and Redeeming the Heathen Tribes of Neu Pommeru

TRUTH is often stranger than fiction, and the old saying revives a new and striking illustration in the remarkable story related, a few days ago, by Mr. John Hopkins Denison, a young American, who has recently returned from an extensive tour, during which he visited New Guinea and a number of little known islands in the great Melanesian group, including New Britain, the largest of the Bismarck archipelago group of islands. It lies a little south of the equator. The Island of New Britain, now known as Neu Pommeru, is located on the northeast coast of New Guinea. It is one of the few savage spots left in the world. It is now in the hands of the Germans and the imperial government has a station on its coast, but the interior of the island is still unexplored. No white man has ever dared to cross the narrowest portion, where it is only eight miles in diameter. In its extent are many tribes at war with one another, and speaking different languages. Cannibalism exists everywhere, except on the north end, which has been civilized in the past twenty years.

In 1875, missionaries first landed on the little cluster of islands, known as the Duke of York group, between the main island and the northern island, known as New Ireland. Their work was carried on with the aid of native Fijian and Samoan teachers, trained in their own land and sent out to face death for Christ's sake. Three of them were killed and eaten during their efforts to carry the teachings of Christ inland. Word was sent to the Rev. Dr. George Brown, the head of the mission, to the effect that "stones were already heated and the taro cooked with which to eat his flesh." It has been a land of unheard of savagery and barbarism. The women are practically slaves, and are bought and sold for the price of a pig. Secret societies are found whose members dress in hideous masks, and who dominate the island and murder the uninitiated and the women without hindrance. During Mr. Denison's visit, there were only two white missionaries in charge of the work. Under them are about a dozen Fijian and Samoan teachers, catechists and ordained ministers. There are also one hundred and three lay-preachers of native birth, and 2,442 church members, and nearly 13,000 adherents who attend occasionally. An institution has been started for the training of men among the natives to become teachers and ministers.

Mr. Denison stayed in the island with the missionary, Mr. Fellmann, for a month, and it proved one of the most interesting months in his life. He also visited the Rev. Mr. Chambers on Duke of York Island, and was impressed with his earnestness and consecration. He thus relates the story of one Sunday that he spent in New Britain with Mr. Fellmann:

"We started out after breakfast along the palm-shaded beach, while the bell was ringing for the service at Raluana Church. We turned in back of the house of Mr. Parkinson, one of the plantation owners, and after a couple of miles into the cocoa-nut groves, struck into the 'bush.' Here we followed winding native paths, through the high grass, and over fields of 'pit' and sugar-cane and taro. We came at last within hearing of childish voices shouting at play, and soon found a broad open space under the trees where a number of women and children were playing together. They looked frightened at seeing us, but Mr. Fellmann soon reassured them, and they led us inside the fence of the village to an open-thatched roof, beneath which the chief was sitting. He greeted us cordially, and we seated ourselves beside him in the midst of his six little boys, who gazed at us with round and shining eyes, and laughing mouths.

REV. HEINRICH FELLMANN AND WIFE
The Missionaries among the South Pacific Cannibals

The women sat on the ground under the trees, playing with a beautiful white cockatoo, with blue eyes and a yellow plume, which danced around and bit their feet. The chief treated us to cocoanut water, and informed me that I was sitting on the grave of a relative. They bury their dear ones a few inches below the house. We could not have our service here, because a greater chief lived a little further on—"lived," for he is dead now. So on we went through the forest, accompanied by the small boys, and at last came to another small village, where we were cordially greeted by two men who tried to shake hands but didn't know how. At last the people gathered. The women wore simply the lava-lava, a gay cloth about the loins. We sat down on a mat made of two palm leaves dexterously braided together, and the people sat on the ground. None of them are baptized Christians, but they came to Mr. Fellmann's annual meeting, when the contributions are made, and contributed largely of their substance. The New Britain natives contributed £500 last year, which is pretty good for former cannibals. It was a picture, to sit there and look at that crowd of brown-bodied, bright-eyed savages, as they squatted in front of the thatched houses and listened to the old Gospel message!

"After the service we moved on, through forest glades and grassy plateaus, getting always higher up and further from the beach until Mount Vartine loomed up, seemingly quite near. At a point where three paths met, we found a group of men, chewing lime and betel, one of whom, a fine-looking fellow, named Peter, is the only Christian they have yet baptized in this inland part of the bush. We came at last to a little village where a large building in native style, built of plaited palm leaves, with three peaks on its thatched roof, was the predominant feature. Mr. Fellmann announced that this was the church. On a bamboo bench covered with matting, an old man was sitting, white-haired and bearded, and blind. This was the old chief To-Watna-Kaia, (the "Son of the Evil One,") once a famous warrior. He greeted us cordially, and after some talk we went on into the teacher's house.

"Soon a chime sounded and then we heard a chant sound out. It was the people reciting the catechism. They always do this to fill in the time, until the preacher arrives. The church has only been built two months. Mr. Fellmann had a big wooden box for a pulpit, and I sat with the people on the palm-leaf matting. There were about seventy-five present. We rose during the hymns, and got down on all-fours during the prayer, which is the approved style of kneeling.

"On the way back we met To-Kaia, the famous old cannibal chief, to whom they had given the name of 'The Devil.' He had once massacred a whole village of 200, and dragged off the bodies of the wounded and dead and hung them up to the sacred trees, to be cut down limb by limb as they were needed for the feast.

"To-Kaia asked if I was a great chief in America, and Mr. Fellmann told him something of my church, and asked if he would like to send a message to my people. 'Send them my love,' he said. 'Tell them I am now a man of love.

Formerly, I was a man of wrath, and a man of war, and hated all men. I have spoiled all the land about, and destroyed the men who dwelt here, in my anger. But your missionaries came and took my hands and removed them from my spear, and crossed them thus, and said 'To-Kaia, these hands must fight no more.' And see, they have not, and now they cannot, for see, they are bound by the love of Jesus.' And he held up his hands tightly clasped. 'And thus I am a man of love and love all places. Therefore, send them my love.'

ANYTHING IN DREAMS?

TEXT — JOEL 2: 28:

"I WILL POUR OUT MY SPIRIT UPON ALL FLESH
... YOUR OLD MEN SHALL DREAM DREAMS, YOUR YOUNG MEN SHALL SEE VISIONS."

IN this photograph of the Millennium the dream is lifted into great conspicuity. You may say of a dream that it is nocturnal fantasia, or that it is the absurd combination of waking thoughts, and with a slur of intonation you may say: "It is only a dream;" but God has honored the dream by making it the avenue through which again and again he has marched upon the human soul, decided the fate of nations, and changed the course of the world's history. God appeared in a dream to Abimelech, warning him against an unlawful marriage; in a dream to Jacob, announcing, by the ladder set against the sky full of angels, the communication between earth and heaven; in a dream to Joseph, foretelling his coming power under the figure of all the sheaves of the harvest bowing down to his sheaf; to the chief butler, foretelling his disimprisonment; to the chief baker, announcing his decapitation; to Pharaoh, showing him first the seven plenty years, and then the seven famine-struck years, under the figure of the seven lean cows devouring the seven fat cows; to Solomon, giving him the choice between wisdom and riches and honor; to a warrior, under the figure of a barley cake smiting down a tent, encouraging Gideon in his battle against the Midianites; to Nebuchadnezzar, under the figure of a broken image and a hewn-down tree, foretelling the overthrow of his power; to Joseph, of the New Testament, announcing the birth of Christ in his own household; and again bidding him fly from Herodic persecutions; to Pilate's wife, warning him not to become complicated with the judicial overthrow of Christ.

Revelation Better than Dreams

We all admit that God in ancient times and under Bible dispensation addressed the people through dreams. The question now is, does God appear in our day and reveal himself through dreams? That is the question everybody asks, and that question I will try to answer. You ask me if I believe in dreams. My answer is, I do, but all I have to say will be under five heads.

Remark the first: the Scriptures are so full of revelation from God, that if we get no communication from him in dreams, we ought, nevertheless, to be satisfied.

With twenty guide-books to tell you how to get to New York or Pittsburg, or London, or Glasgow, or Manchester, do you want a night vision to tell you how to make the journey? We have in this Scripture full direction in regard to the journey of this life, and how to get to the celestial city, and with this grand guide-book, this magnificent directory, we ought to be satisfied. I have more faith in a decision to which I come when I am wide-awake than when I am sound asleep. I have noticed that those who give a great deal of their time to studying dreams get their brains addled. They are very anxious to remember what they dreamed about the first night they slept in a new house. If in their dream they take the hand of a corpse, they are going to die. If they dream of a garden, it means a sepulchre. If something turns out according to a night vision, they say, "Well, I am not surprised. I dreamed it." If it turns out different from the night vision, they say, "Well, dreams go by contraries." In their efforts to put their dreams into rhythm, they put their waking thoughts into discord. Now, the Bible is so full of revelation that we ought to be satisfied if we get no further revelation.

Sound sleep received great honor when Adam slept so extraordinarily that the surgical incision which gave him Eve did not wake him; but there is no such need for extraordinary slumber now, and he who catches an Eve must needs be wide-awake! No need of such a dream as Jacob had with a ladder against the sky, when ten thousand times it has been demonstrated that earth and heaven are in communication. No such dream needed as that which was given to Abimelech, warning him against an unlawful marriage, when we have the records of the county clerk's office. No need of such a dream as was given to Pharaoh about the seven years of famine, for now the seasons march in regular procession, and steamer and rail-train carry breadstuffs to every famine-struck nation. No need of a dream like that which encouraged Gideon, for all through Christendom it is announced and acknowledged and demonstrated that righteousness, sooner or later, will get the victory.

If there should come about a crisis in your life upon which the Bible does not seem to be sufficiently specific, go to God in prayer and you will get especial direction. I have more faith, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, in directions given you with the Bible in your lap and your thoughts uplifted in prayer to God, than in all the information you will get unconscious on your pillow.

I can very easily understand why the Babylonians and the Egyptians, with no Bible, should put so much stress on dreams; and the Chinese in their holy book, Chow King, should think their emperor gets his directions through dreams from God; and that Homer should think that all dreams came from Jove, and that in ancient times dreams were classified into a science; but why do you and I put so much stress upon dreams when we have a supernal book of infinite wisdom on all subjects? why should we harry ourselves with dreams? Why should Eddystone and Barnegat lighthouses question a summer fire-fly?

An Intimation of Immortality

Remark the second: All dreams have an important meaning. They prove that the soul is comparatively independent of the body. The eyes are closed, the senses are dull, the entire body goes into a lethargy which in all languages is used as a type of death, and then the soul spreads its wing and never sleeps. It leaps the Atlantic Ocean, and mingles in scenes three thousand miles away. It travels great reaches of time, flashes back eighty years, and the octogenarian is a boy again in his father's house. If the soul, before it has entirely broken its chain of flesh, can do all this, how far can it leap, what circles can it cut when it is fully liberated! Every dream, whether agreeable or harassing, whether sunshiny or tempestuous, means so much that rising from your couch you ought to kneel down and say: "O God! am I immortal! Whence? Whither? Two natures. My soul caged now—what when the door of the cage is opened? If my soul can fly so far in the few hours in which my body is asleep in the night, how far can it fly when my body sleeps the long sleep of the grave?" Oh! this power to dream, how startling, how overwhelming! Immortal! immortal!

Remark the third: The vast majority of dreams are merely the result of disturbed physical condition, and are not a supernatural message. Job had carbuncles, and he was scared in the night. He says: "Thou scarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me with visions." Solomon had an overwrought brain, overwrought with public business, and he suffered from erratic slumber, and he writes in Ecclesiastes: "A dream cometh through the multitude of business." Dr. Gregory, in experimenting with dreams, found that a bottle of hot water put to his feet while in slumber made him think he was going up the hot sides of Mount Etna. Another morbid physician, experimenting with dreams, his feet uncovered through sleep, thought he was riding in an Alpine diligence. But a great many dreams are merely narcotic disturbance. Anything that you see while under the influence of chloral or brandy or "hashish" or laudanum, is not a revelation from God.

Causes of Distressing Dreams

The learned DeQuincey did not ascribe to divine communication what he saw in sleep, opium-saturated, dreams which he afterward described in the following words: "I was worshiped, I was sacrificed, I fled from the wrath of Brahma, through all the forests of Asia. Vishnu hated me. Sceva laid in wait for me. I came suddenly upon Isis and Osiris. I had done a deed, they said, that made the crocodiles tremble. I was buried for a thousand years in stone coffins, with mummies and sphinxes in narrow chambers at the heart of eternal pyramids. I was kissed with the cancerous kiss of crocodiles, and lay confounded with unutterable slimy things among wreathy and Nilotic mud."

Do not mistake narcotic disturbance for divine revelation. But I have to tell you that the majority of the dreams are merely the penalty of outraged digestive organs, and you have no right to mistake the nightmare for heavenly revelation. Late suppers are a warrant deed for bad dreams. Highly-spiced salads at eleven o'clock at night, instead of opening the door heavenward, open the door infernal and diabolical. You outrage natural law, and you insult the God who made those laws. It takes from three to five hours to digest food, and you have no right to keep your digestive organs in struggle when the rest of your body is in somnolence. The general rule is, eat nothing after six o'clock at night, retire at ten, sleep on your right side, keep the window open five inches for ventilation, and other worlds will not disturb you much. By physical maltreatment you take the ladder that Jacob saw in his dream and you lower it to the nether world, allowing the ascent of the demoniacal. Healthy people do not want this cadaverous and sleepy thing that some people call religion. They want a religion that lives regularly by day and sleeps soundly by night. If through trouble or coming on of old age or exhaustion of Christian service, you cannot sleep well, then you may expect from God "songs in the night;" but there are no blessed communications to those who willingly surrender to indigestibles. Napoleon's army at Leipzig, Dresden, and Borodino, came near being destroyed through the disturbed gastric juices of its command. That is the way you have lost some of your battles.

Another remark I make is that our dreams are apt to be merely the echo of our day-time thoughts. I will give you a recipe for pleasant dreams. Fill your dreams with elevated thought and unselfish action, and your dreams will be set to music. If all day you are goggle-eyed and grasping, and avaricious, in your dreams you will see gold that you cannot clutch, and bargains in which you were out-shylocked. If during the day you are irascible, and pugnacious, and gunpowdery of disposition, you will at night have battle with enemies in which they will get the best of you. If you are all day long in a hurry, at night you will dream of rail-trains that you want to catch, while you cannot move one inch toward the depot. If you are always over suspicious and expectant of assault, you will have at night hallucinations of assassins with daggers drawn. No one wonders that Richard III., the iniquitous, the night before the battle of Bosworth Field dreamed that all those whom he had murdered stared at him, and that he was torn to pieces by demons from the pit.

The Echo of Thought

Waking thoughts have their echo in sleeping thoughts. If a man spend his life in trying to make others happy and is heavenly-minded, around his pillow he will see cripples who have got over their crutch, a procession of celestial imperials, and hear the grand march roll down from drums of heaven over jasper pavements. You are very apt to hear in dreams what you hear when you are wide-awake.

Now, having shown you that having a Bible we ought to be satisfied not getting any further communication from God, and having shown you that all dreams have an important mission, since they show the comparative independence of the soul from the body, and having shown you that the majority of dreams are a result of disturbed physical condition, and having shown you that our sleeping thoughts are apt to be an echo of our waking thoughts, I come now to my fifth and most important remark, and that is to say, that it is capable of proof that God does sometimes in our day, and has often since the close of the Bible dispensation, appeared to people in dreams.

All dreams that make you better are from God. How do I know it? Is not God the source of all good? does not take a very logical mind to argue that Tertullian and Martin Luther believed in dreams. The dreams of John Huss are immortal. St. Augustine the Christian father, gives us the fact that a Carthaginian physician was persuaded of the immortality of the soul by an argument which he heard in a dream. The night before his assassination the wife of Julius Cæsar dreamed that her husband fell dead across her lap.

It is possible to prove that God does appear in dreams to warn, to convert, and to save men. My friend, a retired sea captain and a Christian, tells me that one night while on the sea he dreamed that a ship crew were in great suffering. Waking from his dream he put about the ship, tacked in different direction, surprised everybody on his vessel—they thought he was going crazy—sailed on in another direction hour after hour, and for many hours, until he came to the perishing crew and rescued them, and brought them to New York. Who conducted that dream? The God of the sea.

Rescued Through a Dream

The Rev. Dr. Bushnell, in his marvelous book entitled Nature and the Supernatural, gives the following fact that he got from Captain Yount, in California, a fact confirmed by many families: Captain Yount dreamed twice one night that one hundred and fifty miles away there was a company of travelers fast in the snow. He also saw in the dream, rocks of peculiar formation, and telling this dream to an old hunter, the hunter said: "Why, I remember those rocks; those rocks are in the Carson Valley Pass, one hundred and fifty miles away." Captain Yount, impelled by this dream, although laughed at by his neighbors, gathered men together, took mules and blankets, and started out on the expedition, traveled one hundred and fifty miles saw those very rocks which he had described in his dream, and found the suffering ones at the foot of those rocks, brought them back to confirm the story of Captain Yount. Who conducted that dream? The God of the snow, the God of the Sierra Nevadas.

Furthermore, I have to say that there are people who were converted to God through a dream. The Rev. John Newton, the fame of whose piety fills all Christendom, while a profligate sailor on shipboard, in his dream, thought that a being approached him and gave him a very beautiful ring, and put it upon his finger, and said to him: "As long as you wear that ring you will be prospered; if you lose that ring you will be ruined." In the same dream another personage appeared, and by a strange infatuation persuaded John Newton to throw overboard that ring, and it sank into the sea. Then the mountains in sight were full of fire and the air was lurid with consuming wrath. While John Newton was repenting of his folly in having thrown overboard the treasure, another personage came through the dream, and told John Newton he would plunge into the sea and bring that ring up if he desired it. He plunged into the sea and brought it up, and said to John Newton, "Here is that gem, but I think I will keep it for you, lest you lose it again;" and John Newton consented, and all the fire went out from the mountains, and all the signs of lurid wrath disappeared from the air, and John Newton said that he saw in his dream that that valuable gem was his soul, and that the being who persuaded him to throw it overboard was Satan, and that he one who plunged in and restored that gem, keeping it for him, was Christ. And that dream makes one of the most wonderful chapters in the life of that most wonderful man.

A German was crossing the Atlantic Ocean, and in his dream he saw a man with a handful of white flowers, and he was told to follow the man who had that handful of white flowers. The German, arriving in New York, wandered into the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, and Mr. Lamphier—the great apostle of prayer-meetings—that day had given to him a bunch of tube-roses. They stood on his desk, and at the close of the religious services he took the tube-roses and started homeward, and the German followed him, and through an interpreter told Mr. Lamphier that on the sea he had dreamed of a man with a handful of white flowers and was told to follow him. Suffice it to say, that through that interview and following interviews he became a Christian, and is a city missionary preaching the Gospel to his own countrymen. God in a dream!

Rev. Herbert Mendes was converted to God through a dream of the last judgment; and many of us have had some dream of that great day of judgment which shall be the winding up of the world's history. If you have not dreamed of it, perhaps to-night you may dream of that day. There are enough materials to make a dream. Enough voices, for there shall be the roaring of the elements, and the great earthquake. Enough light for the dream, for the world shall blaze. Enough excitement, for the mountains shall fall. Enough water, for the ocean shall rear. Enough astronomical phenomena, for the stars shall go out. Enough populations, for all the races of all the ages will fall into line of one of two processions, the one ascending and the other descending, the one led on by the rider on the white horse of eternal victory, the other led on by Apollyon on the black charger of eternal defeat. The dream comes on me now, and I see the lightnings from above answering the volcanic disturbances from beneath, and I hear the long reverberating thunders that shall wake up the dead, and all the seas lifting up their crystal voices, cry, "Come to judgment!" and all the voices of the heaven cry, "Come to judgment!" and crumbling mausoleum, and Westminster Abbeys, and pyramids of the dead with marble voices cry: "Come to judgment!" And the archangel seizes an instrument of music which has never yet been sounded, an instrument of music that was made only for one sound, and thrusting that mighty trumpet through the clouds, and turning it this way, he shall put it to his lip and blow the long, loud blast that shall make the solid earth quiver, crying, "Come to judgment!"

Then from this earthly grossness quit,
Attired in stars, we shall forever sit.

TO SAVE THE CHILDREN

MISS REMINGTON'S WORK IN THE SLUMS OF BUFFALO, N. Y., FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE BOYS AND GIRLS OF THE TENEMENTS

MOTHERS' MEETING IN THE REMINGTON SETTLEMENT

MISS MARY E. REMINGTON

CORNER IN MISS REMINGTON'S NURSERY

STANDING outside a large building in Buffalo, N. Y., was a multitude of children of various ages, many nationalities and differing conditions of life. The rain began falling and soon there was a heavy downpour, but not a child stirred. No one wanted to lose the place of vantage near the closed doors. Presently the lady for whom they were waiting arrived. "There she is! there she is! Here is Miss Remington," were cries of welcome, uttered in childish treble. The doors were opened and the children eagerly trooped in. They hurried to a large room, where they were evidently much at home. Miss Remington seated herself at a piano at one end of the room and began playing, while the children took their seats. Previous experiences prepared them to expect a treat and they had one. For over an hour, talk, interspersed with music and singing, kept them in a state of blissful ecstasy. Looking at the intent faces one could not but realize what a contrast that hour's pleasure was to the ordinary occupations of the squalid home in the neighboring tenements.

Miss Remington cheerfully explained what she was doing in that big building on Canal street, Buffalo. She had had some experience in rescue work, and many a miserable man and outcast girl have learned from her the way of deliverance from evil life and gained encouragement in beginning a better course by the power of Christ. But it is hard work. Evil habits once formed have an awful power. Bad connections and vile associates, too often undo the good work, and the victim, almost delivered, is lured back again into the old bondage.

How much better it would be, Miss Remington thought, if the children could be reached before evil habits gained power over them. It was easy to learn from a visit to their homes, or even by a walk through the streets on which they were situated, why they went astray. The little stifling rooms that they called home were often dirty, untidy, and miserable. There was no comfort there, no place to play, and the air was reeking with vile odors. The street was not much better, but here, at any rate, was room to move and room to play. Out the street was a terrible school of vice.

It was at New Haven, Conn., that Miss Remington engaged in rescue work. When she went to Buffalo she began with the children. She gained permission to use the old Grand Trunk Depot, and she gathered from the streets some little children for a kindergarten, and some older ones for a Sunday School. Her happy faculty for interesting the little ones won her a large circle of child friends, who grew to love her and almost worship her. But she needed a permanent home, with better advantages for her work. She saw a large building, which had a saloon on the ground floor, and dancing rooms and tenements above. With wonderful faith, she hired the whole building for a year and had it thoroughly cleansed and renovated. The old place soon swarmed with children, for Miss Remington kept open house. She arranged classes for the girls in which they were taught home service, dish-washing, bed-making, bread-baking, etc. In the boys' classes there was instruction in cabinet-making, chair-caning, shoemaking and mending, etc., and at regular intervals all met together for one of Miss Remington's talks and musical entertainments.

TEACHERS OF CHILDREN IN MISS REMINGTON'S INSTITUTE

Whoever may have looked askance at the work at the outset, there is but one opinion of it now. The mothers and fathers soon perceived the improvement in the manners and disposition of their children. They were more respectful and more helpful than before, and there were some of the mothers who learned things from their little daughters that they did not know before. They became so impressed with the value of these lessons, that when Miss Remington invited them to a Mothers' meeting they eagerly accepted her invitation, and the Mothers' meeting has become a weekly institution. There lessons are given in cooking and sewing, and there is always a bright talk. Even the city authorities showed their appreciation of the improvement in the neighborhood by congratulating Miss Remington on her success.

We are glad to learn that the churches and religious societies have rendered valuable aid to this zealous worker. Gospel services are regularly held in the old building once devoted to drinking and dancing. Rev. W. E. Wadge has the general charge of them and leaders are assigned by the various denominations and Christian Endeavor societies. Many new departments have been added lately as the means increased. The nursery has been a most valuable innovation, affording tired mothers a little rest while they do their work, or enjoy one of Miss Remington's social meetings. A penny savings bank is a new departure that has quite a large business. Recently a good physician notified Miss Remington, that although he did not wish to pose as a philanthropist, he had seen so much of the good that she was doing, that he would willingly respond, free of charge, to any call she might make for medical service among her young friends. Other friends have shown similar appreciation in teaching and in providing funds for entertainments or outings. Thus encouraged the good work has progressed and has proved a blessing to the city.

THE GOSPEL AMONG THE SOLDIERS

What the Army Branch of the Y.M.C.A. is Doing

WHILE patriotic citizens grow enthusiastic over the brave exploits of the boys in blue, there is frequently a feeling, silent or expressed, that the soldier is necessarily a wicked profligate man. Unhappily, there are sufficient examples in the army to give color to this idea, but there is abundant evidence that it would be a grievous injustice to regard the majority in that light. There are many good men wearing the national uniform—men of upright moral life, conscientious in word and deed. There might be many more such men if the efforts now being made by the Young Men's Christian Association had been made in years gone by. The soldier has fought our battles, he has brought honor and glory to our flag, and while we have attended to his material wants and have pensioned him when he has suffered in the service, we have not done all that we might have done for the saving of his soul. It is gratifying to know that an effort is now being made to remedy our faults in this respect. The Y. M. C. A. has taken the case in hand, and with intelligence and tact is striving to make the soldier a better man. It proceeds on the principle that by providing wholesome and moral amusements and by supplying the wants that the Government does not recognize, the soldier will be weaned from bad ways and will be grateful for the attention to his comfort. The principle has been found true. The soldier has appreciated the interest taken in his welfare and has gladly availed himself of the conveniences provided for his comfort. He has learned to know his best friends, and quite understands that it is better for him to follow their advice and be in their society than to spend his time and money loafing in resorts where he gets harm to body and soul.

At the opening of the Spanish-American War, as the soldiers were gathered in the Southern drill camps,

Mr. William C. Dodge responded, and provided an attractive Colonial building for use as a club house and Association headquarters for the men of Governor's Island. This building has an average daily attendance of over one-half the entire garrison. It contains a reading room, library, lunch room, gymnasium, parlor, writing room, etc.

One way in which the Army Branch has been of great convenience to the men is in the matter of letter writing. The Association supplies everything necessary for correspondence except the postage stamp. 2,500 letters are written every month in the four Army Branches in New York, and many a mother's heart is made glad because the Association has made it so easy for her boy to write home. A Tennessee recruit, in asking for stationery, explained: "I bought this box of paper to write to my girl, but she liked the Y. M. C. A. paper best." Possibly it was the red, white and blue shield which attracted her, but more probably it was the fact that the letter was written in the Y. M. C. A., where many a tempted young man finds refuge.

The lunch room is a popular place of gathering. If the soldier tires of "artillery pudding," he gets a triangle of pie for a nickel, or, if the other army mess dishes a most interesting one, and many a thrilling tale confided to the secretary and his co-workers. In one of the forts in New York harbor there is a soldier who claims to be a socialist, but he talks a good deal about anarchism. He is being taught as a gunner to fire a 750-pound shell, which would wreck any skyscraper in the city or, if rightly placed, a whole city block. Being of alien birth he is not particularly sympathetic with our institutions. This man's leisure almost wholly spent in the Army Branch of the Y. M. C. A., and though he may not understand its genius, cannot but understand its kindness, for kindness is the universal language of the love of the Divine Exemplar which makes this Army Branch an open sesame to the hearts of the men.

The work at Governor's Island is being duplicated at three other forts in New York Harbor. A few months ago a battalion of four-hundred men came up from Puerto Rico. They had been there sixteen months without a chaplain and in a tropical climate, where temptation abounds, where a quart of rum can be bought for ten cents. These men were eight months at Governor's Island, and were then forwarded to China, but in the organization were forty-two soldiers learn by their errors, and have left the Castle new men in purpose and in Christ.

The soldier's life, notwithstanding its military glitter, is a dreary one. He has no privacy and is constantly associated with profane and evil men. The expressions of approval by officers and men of the efforts of the Y. M. C. A. are universal. A recent recruit expressed his appreciation of the building by saying that if it had not been for that building and those meetings he certainly would not have been able to stand the "breaking in" process. In his own words, "I would have cut freight." The life story of each one of these soldiers they were accompanied by a peaceful army of young men numbering two hundred and fifty, who, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., sought to bring to the soldier some of the comforts and amenities of life which, by reason of his profession, he was deprived of. They accompanied the army into Cuba, they met it at Camp Wyckoff when it returned decimated by sickness and casualties of battle. On their return home, these young men began to inquire into the condition and needs of the soldiers located in our local posts. These posts are usually unprovided with chaplains, and the men find their recreation and their entertainment on the streets and in the resorts of our great cities. The vices of the city have followed the soldier, but few of its opportunities for improvement and elevation. By reason of a petition signed by some fifty soldiers, and by invitation of the commanding officer of Governor's Island, about two years ago, an Army Department was established of the New York City Y. M. C. A. in that fort. A casemate was fitted up with games, books and papers, and presided over by secretaries who were in deep sympathy with the soldier and who sought to inspire him with the desire to reach a higher standard of life. The attendance soon outgrew the casemate. In response to an invitation given by Major B. K. Roberts at the anniversary of the New York Association, March, 1899, have lost their savor, he can regale himself on pork chops or his favorite ham and eggs. It is here he also finds entertainment, and many an evening is pleasantly spent which otherwise would have found the soldier loitering around Battery Park or drifting about the city streets. On a recent evening at 6:30 every chair in the building (150) had a soldier in it waiting for the curtain to rise for a mock trial, a watermelon case, which was to be given by a young people's society of a city church, and at eight o'clock 230 men were packed in a room about 25x30, while every window from the outside had its quota of spectators seeking to see and hear what was going on.

Soldiers are not particularly noted for attending religious meetings, yet during October the twelve services held at Fort Columbus were attended on an average by over thirty men. Among the military prisoners in Castle William, where about two hundred are confined, two services a week are held, which are greatly enjoyed and are a great inspiration to the prisoners. It is an interesting sight, the groups of young men from whom the army uniform has been taken in disgrace. They sing as heartily as if they were in a church. The windows are barred, and the speaker and his audience are under the inspection of guards armed with heavy Colt revolvers. Many of these young men have determined to who were members of the Army Branch of the Y. M. C. A., a significant fact for those who love the Stars and Stripes.

The work, as yet, is only at its beginning, and it will become more effective as time passes. One need have already been perceived. A piano or an harmonium would add much to the attraction of the rooms. Funds are available as yet for this purpose, but the managers hope that some kind friends will supply the need.

Mr. George A. Sanford, Secretary of the Army Branch of the Y. M. C. A., to whom we are indebted for these facts, points out that the soldier is unable to reserve from his scanty pay any more than a nominal fee for membership. There is, therefore, a chronic deficiency between receipts and expenditure. For the filling up of this financial gap, the Association must look to the Christian public. Nor, we believe, will it look in vain. The work has proved its usefulness; the results are most encouraging, and such work is sure of support. Men who recognize the fact that they are the stewards of Christ and use their means in the advancement of his kingdom, must surely see in this effort for the benefit of the soldier, an opportunity that should not be missed. It deserves the hearty and cordial support of all who desire that the soldiers of our country should become soldiers of the Lord Jesus Christ.

NOTABILITIES OF THE FIFTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS

The Complexion, Religious and Otherwise, of the National Legislators who Assembled this Week

THE great granite building on the Capitolian hill at Washington is again rife with life and excitement. All summer long, indeed, since the early days of spring, soon after the Fifty-sixth Congress adjourned, almost the entire structure has been in the hands of the builders. The west side of the central portion of the building, where the books of the Congressional Library were stowed away before their removal to their present magnificent home, has been remodeled into handsome and luxurious committee rooms. The Supreme Court quarters, in the east wing, has been completely made over. Its roof has been raised, its dimensions have been extended, new flooring put in, and the whole room freshly decorated. The Representative Hall has also been enlarged, and furnished with chairs and desks similar to those which were put in the Senate chamber two years ago. In short, all of the Capitol presents a very spick and span appearance for the Fifty-seventh Congress, which begins its busy session next week.

HON. W. GARDNER

It is an interesting body of men which this Congress brings together. They will represent some of the brightest brains, and, it might be added, some of the largest bank accounts in the country. Of its four hundred and forty-five members, one hundred and nine will, with two or three exceptions, take their places for the first time in these chambers, and be initiated into the honors, the pleasures, and, alas, also into the disillusionment, the testing, and the trying experiences of a Congressman's life. Politically, the Congress is divided into two hundred and fifty-four Republicans, one hundred and eighty-one Democrats, and ten Independents.

There is no danger of the session being dull this winter, not by any means! It can safely be predicted that even the new member, who generally finds himself at such a loss during his first term, will discover plenty to keep him busy. To begin with, it is the long session, and that always means more downright hard work than can be undertaken in the short one, but, aside from that, there are measures of the gravest moment which must be brought up for legislation. The Isthmian waterway, the Ship Subsidy, the Cuban, and Philippine vexed questions, are among a few of the more important that will be considered. That it is to be an unusually momentous term is evidenced by that most infallible of signs—the immense lobby that has already settled down in the town for the winter.

The Fifty-seventh Congress is not, by a large majority, a body of old men, but does not contain as many members below the forty-year line as did the Fifty-sixth. In the United States Senate, only two fall below that age—Beveridge of Indiana, and Bailey of Texas. There are eight Senators, however, below forty-five, and nine between that and fifty. Between the years of fifty and sixty, there are twenty-nine; between sixty and seventy, there are twenty-four, while fourteen Senators have passed their seventieth birthdays. Alabama's junior Senator, Mr. Pettus, is the senior solon of the chamber in point of years, having reached his four-score milestone. His colleague, Senator Morgan, ranks next, at seventy-seven, and Senators Hawley and Hoar are the two members who are in their seventy-fifth years. Senator Platt, of Connecticut, who has been in the Senate for twenty-two years, and Senator Stewart, of Nevada, who has been there for twenty-six, are both seventy-four. All of the older men of the Senate have seen long terms of service excepting Mr. Pettus.

HON. JOSEPH SIMON

It has become quite a practice to refer to the United States Senate as a club of rich men, but on the whole, and especially in speaking of both it and the House, the term does not apply. Of course, there are some very rich men in both the upper and lower branches. Mr. Clark of Montana, Mr. Kearns of Utah, Mr. Hanna of Ohio, Mr. Kean of New Jersey, Mr. Elkins of West Virginia, and Mr. Aldrich of Rhode Island, are the multi-millionaires of the Senate, while Messrs. Platt and Depew, of New York, Wetmore of Rhode Island, Foraker of Ohio, Foster of Washington, Jones of Nevada, Lodge of Massachusetts, Patterson of Colorado, Perkins of California, Quay of Pennsylvania, Scott of West Virginia, Warren of Wyoming, Proctor of Vermont, and about a half-dozen members of the House are by no means poor. They all could probably write their individual checks in six figures. The wealth this body represents is not apt to make it of any less import in the eyes of society matrons of the Capital who are the mothers of beautiful and marriageable daughters. That there are eight widowers and four eligible bachelors in the Senate, with double that number in the House, will mean for them an endless round of dinner and theatre parties, five o'clock teas, and receptions, if they are once entrapped in these delusive fascinations. There will be two bridegrooms in the Senate; New York's famous after-dinner-story-telling former railroad magnate, Mr. Chauncey M. Depew, whose wedding in Paris, will take place early in December, and Senator Blackburn, of Kentucky, who marries a distant kinswoman of the same name, about the time Congress convenes.

HON. JAS. E. WATSON

are a company of well-educated men. While many of them are self-made, in the sense that from early youth they have made their own way in life, one hundred and sixty-nine of them have been college-bred.

It is a distinctively American body in this also, that almost every profession and calling are represented in its membership. Of course, the followers of the legal profession outnumber all others two to one. In the Senate, there are sixty-four lawyers, and in the House, two hundred and twenty-four. Arkansas and Mississippi's delegations are entirely comprised of them, and all of Georgia's but one. Connecticut is notable in that none of her Representatives belong to that profession, but as both of her Senators are legal advisers she is not likely to suffer from that. Forty-seven of the Congressmen are engaged in mercantile pursuits; fourteen are editors, eight are bankers, and six acknowledge themselves mine owners. There are several teachers among them, with but one college president. There are two physicians and one druggist; one who is the president of an express company, and another who is the president of an insurance company; there is one who was a former Comptroller of a State treasury, and another who was State Treasurer. There is one postmaster, who has seen twenty-two years of service in a New England town. There is one minister in the four hundred and forty-five members, and while there are probably a number of others who are engaged in the liquor traffic there is but one who announces himself as a brewer.

Thirteen of the Senators were Governors of their States before coming to Washington, and several made enviable records for themselves. Mr. Warren was twice appointed Territorial Governor of Wyoming, and elected to that office after its admittance to Statehood. Senator Tillman served two terms as Governor of South Carolina. His second administration was signalized by the passage of the much-discussed dispensary liquor law. Senator Foster was the leader against the lottery forces in 1890, when the Legislature of Louisiana refused to grant the lottery company a renewal of its charter. He was subsequently nominated for Governor by the anti-lottery forces, and defeated Mr. McEnery, who is now his colleague in the Senate. Mr. Simmons, the new Senator from North Carolina, although never its Governor, was an active factor in the Legislature of his State.

HON. C. A. SULLOWAY

Our lawmakers are not lacking in either pedigree or ancestry. Many of them come from colonial and revolutionary stock. Senator Pettus was the son of a revolutionary captain, and Senator Deboe, of Kentucky, was the grandson of another one. Senator Taliferro, of Florida, is a descendant of his great, great-grandfather, who came from England in 1650. Representative Livingston's grandfather served under Washington; Senator Foster's forebears landed at Ipswich in 1638, and his parents were Wisconsin pioneers. Senator Gallinger's great-grandfather emigrated to the United States from Holland previous to our difference with England in 1776. General Grosvenor, Ohio's best-known member of the House, has a family record of which he is particularly proud. His grandfather was a colonel in the Revolutionary War; his father was a major in the war of 1812 and he himself is a veteran of the Civil War. The new member from the Peekskill district, New York, Mr. Cornelius Pugsley is the seventh in direct descent in his father's family. His grandfather and father served also in the wars of the Revolution and 1812.

While there is but one minister of the Gospel in the Fifty-seventh Congress—Reverend Washington Gardner, a Methodist clergyman from Michigan—there are six sons of ministers among its members. Senator Quay's father was a distinguished Presbyterian divine, who preached for nearly sixty years throughout Pennsylvania. Senator Deboe, and Senator Bacon, of Georgia, were both sons of Baptist ministers. Representatives Warnock of Ohio, and Gooch of Kentucky, are the sons of pioneer Methodist ministers, who were actively engaged in itinerating for fifty years in their respective States. Representative Calderhead, of Kansas, is a worthy son of the late Reverend E. B. Calderhead, a Western minister of the Presbyterian Church. Representative Lanahan of Texas, is the father of a son who is a Methodist clergyman. But while the ministry itself has not a large representation in the highest legislative halls, there is scarcely a denomination of the land which has not some adherents among our lawmakers. Many of them are aggressive church-workers. Mr. Watson of Indiana, has been president of his State's Epworth League for a number of years, and affiliates with that organization in the Methodist churches of Washington. Mr. Lester of Georgia, and Mr. Bates of Pennsylvania, are both Baptists, who are well-known church-workers. Mr. Bates has been a member of his church at Meadville since he was a lad of twelve; he is its secretary of the Board of Trustees, and until recently was the superintendent of its Sabbath School.

HON. RUFUS E. LESTER

Mr. Candler, one of the new members from Mississippi, is another Baptist who has held high offices in his denomination, and while he is not a preacher, he is frequently called upon in his neighborhood to assist in conducting revival services. Mr. Evans of Pennsylvania, is a trustee of the Congregational Church of Ebensburg, and has been the superintendent of its Sunday School for the past five years. Mr. Haskins of Vermont, has been a member of Saint Michael's Episcopal Church of Brattleboro for thirty-five years, and a good part of that time one of its wardens and vestrymen.

These are but a few of those who have written of their active participation in church endeavors, but while this is the case, it is also true with the majority of them that they are, as Senator Allison of Iowa expressed it, "Good brothers-in-law to the churches, for we all pay our dues." Denominationally, the Methodists lead in both the Senate and House, there being eighty-two members who themselves, or their families, affiliate with that denomination. The Presbyterian Church comes next with sixty-eight adherents; then follows the Episcopal with fifty-seven; the Baptist with forty-four; the Congregationalist with thirty-two; the Roman Catholic with thirty; the Lutheran with ten; the Christian with seven; the Universalist with six; the Unitarian and Dutch Reform, each with three; and the Swedish and Swedenborg each with one. There are two Salvationists in the House, its tallest member, Mr. Sulloway of New Hampshire, and Mr. J. F. Kern, the editor of the Bellville, Ill., News. There is one Hebrew in the Senate, Mr. Simon of Oregon, and five in the House. But one of these, Judge Goldfogle of New York, indicated his church preferences. He and his mother attend the Temple Rodeph Shalom at the corner of Lexington avenue and Thirty-sixth street. This leaves ninety-three Members of Congress who, while expressing their faith in all denominations, preferred not to indicate any special preference. ABBY G. BAKER.

HON. A. L. BATES

American Church in Berlin

Mr. F. M. Prescott, now in Berlin, writes to friends in this country that Mr. John D. Rockefeller has contributed $10,000 toward the completion of the American church building in Berlin. The structure will shortly be completed, and will be free from debt. $40,000 was paid for the site on Nollendorf Platz, and the building will cost about $40,000 more. It will have a seating capacity of 450, and a tower 120 feet high. The services will continue to be interdenominational, as heretofore. Rev. Dr. Dickey, the pastor, through his energetic efforts, has been largely instrumental in bringing the project to a successful completion. Mr. Prescott writes:

The church now holds its services in the Y. M. C. A. hall. Dr. Dickey told of his making three trips to America to get funds for the building of the church, but as it was interdenominational no particular church or society felt bound to help it, and he was obliged to return and beg personally for it. On Sunday, Sept. 15, the Sabbath following the death of President McKinley, appropriate services were held in the church, the pastor preached a sermon for the occasion. The choir was dressed in black, and the church was draped with flags and mourning. Fully 300 persons were standing, unable to obtain seats. Very impressive services were held in our church the day of President McKinley's burial.

"SAVED AND THY HOUSE" * The Passover

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DEC. 15.
EXODUS 12: 1-17

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT:
CHRIST, OUR PASSOVER, IS SACRIFICED FOR US. 1. COR. 5: 7

The Lesson Story

LET us imagine ourselves in the Temple at Jerusalem about 3 P.M., April 14, A.D. 30. The Court of Israel is thronged with men, and the galleries of the Court of the Women are filled with women, all alike eager to witness the offering of the pascal lamb. The priests are standing in a long row around the great brazen altar of burnt offering, separated from the Court of Israel only by a low coping, passing blood in silver basins, the blood of the pascal lamb, from one to the other, the last priest pouring it out upon the great altar. The crowds keep coming, each man bringing a lamb, which is killed, and the blood passed to the altar—not less than a quarter of a million lambs in all. Each man goes away carrying the lamb that he and his family are to eat.

Let us follow one man to his home. The table is spread as for a hasty meal. A large plate is placed upon the table, on which there is a piece of slightly-roasted lamb, and just beside it, on the same plate, is a hard-boiled egg and bitter herbs and green onions. There are also flat sheets of very thin bread, and four goblets of wine. When the members of the family gather around the table, they are dressed as for a journey, with walking sticks in their hands, their clothing being fastened tidily and securely by girdles, so as to be out of their way when walking. Their eating is mingled with praise and prayer and song. "Why do we have this kind of a supper, father?" asks one of the youngest boys. "And why have so many lambs been killed to-day?"

The father points to the little box or phylactery which he wears upon his forehead, fastened there with leather straps, and to another upon his arm, and says, "In these, my son, the command of our God is written that we shall every year observe this Feast of the Passover, and teach our children the meaning of it. I will tell you what Passover means. Long, long years ago, when our forefathers were bondmen in Egypt, and when their sorrows were great, because they were cruelly treated by the Egyptians, being made to work like slaves, and beaten by taskmasters, they cried to God for help. And God heard their cry, and promised to bring them out of Egypt into the land of Canaan, which should be their very own. But the Pharaoh of Egypt, the king, was quite determined that they should not go, and God had to punish him very severely before he would let them go. The last punishment was the hardest of all, for God sent the angel of death into the king's house, and into the house of every Egyptian, and in every house there was one dead, the oldest child. But God told the death angel to pass over the houses of our fathers, and the sign by which the death angel knew which were the houses he must not enter was the blood of a lamb, which our fathers had been told to sprinkle on their door-posts. Our fathers were told by the great Moses, who got the command from God, that they must be ready to start on that dreadful night, that they must have a supper of lamb and bitter herbs all prepared, and they must be dressed for the journey.

"We are doing the same to-night, that we may show our God that we remember his loving kindness. And our celebration has another meaning that I would have you know. We are cruelly treated now, not by Egyptians, but by Romans, and our God has promised to deliver us by sending his own son from heaven to be our Messiah-King. So in the Passover we think of both the past and the future. We do not now put the blood of lambs on our door-posts, but we sprinkle it on the Temple altar, and by that sign we are known to be the people of the true and living God. The lamb which we eat together, a part of which has been placed on the altar, God's part, makes this a meal of friendship with God. We eat with him as with a friend.

"The egg will be hard for you to understand, my son. It is to make us think of those whom God drowned in the sea, when they were following our fathers to bring them back. Let us remember them with sorrow, and not with hatred. The 'bitter herbs' are to remind us of the cruelty our fathers suffered, and also of the sorrow which comes to us from our sins. The onions and the unleavened bread are the food of the poor. While we eat these reminders of our fathers' poverty, we must remember thankfully that everything we have is the gift of God. And the wine is a picture of God's love poured out for us."

He who has seen the blooming of the century plant can never forget it, but a greater fruition was at hand. On that, the fifteen hundredth anniversary of the Passover, it was about to burst into its fullness of meaning. But only one soul in all Jerusalem realized how momentous was the time. At the very hour when the Jewish father was telling his boy the Passover story, the very Messiah who should redeem Israel was in an upper room with his apostles, eating the pascal supper that was passing into the "Lord's Supper," a memorial of redemption from the bondage of sin through the blood of the Lamb of God, a feast of brotherhood also in which all kindred by that blood should meet as one household.

to the broken loaf, the blood turning to wine. It is therefore necessary to understand the Passover in order to understand the Lord's Supper, and both are to be studied as pictures of the Cross, in which bud and blossom have become the ripened fruit of "finished" redemption. Both suppers are golden links in the chain of covenants between God and man, whose history is the history of redemption—the covenants of God with Adam, Noah, Abraham, which, with the covenants of the Passover and of Sinai, make up the "old covenant," or testament, that led on to what Jesus called, at the Lord's Supper, "the new covenant, or testament, in my blood." This "new" and "better covenant" was pictured in advance by the Passover, which, on the Egyptian side, was a symbol of God's justice and wrath, as we learned in the last lesson; but on the Hebrew side, a symbol of God's love and mercy. "The children of Israel had light in their dwellings." But their escape from the plagues was not because they were lamb for his household. The shades of evening are already gathering. At midnight the destroying angel is expected, but the doors of this home have no sign of the blood. The Hebrew is the secretary of an Egyptian priest, from whom he has learned enough to make him proud, but not enough to make him either humble or wise. He answers his wife thus: "I have my doubts whether God ever really authorized Moses to scare us with that story of the death angel. I am not going to be frightened into religion anyhow. Even if the angel of justice comes I have nothing to fear. Our drunken neighbor does well to put blood on his door, but the messenger of justice would never molest such an upright man as I am. To be sure, I have stopped praying to Jehovah because it would displease my Egyptian master, and make me lose my place, and he would not let me off rest or worship on the Sabbath if I should ask it; but I always pay my debts, and live a good moral life. Instead of putting blood-marks on the door, I will write out a statement of my charities, and tack it up, with testimonials of my good character. Sure that is worth more than a few drops of blood. I don't like the doctrine of the blood anyway. It smells of the shambles." Thus he moves to amend God's plan of salvation to make it real. "When I see your moralities and charities I will pass over you." His first-born girl, however, makes such an addition that he finally compromises, and hangs up a live lamb on the outside of the door, which he also doubly bolts. "A lamb is of any value, surely it is the lamb's life, and not its death, that we save us," he says.

In another Hebrew cabin, the father is preparing to be busy at midnight with ablutions and prayers, thinking that such religious ceremonies have more saving efficacy than a few drops of blood. He has moved to amend God's simple plan of salvation to read

"When I see your ceremonies I will pass over you."

Beside a third cabin, the father stands with whip and ture belts, about to shed his own blood, to put that on the door as having more merit than any other blood. He has moved to amend God's plan, "When I see your penances, I will pass over you."

In a fourth cabin, the father is reasoning with his wife thus: "I have killed the lamb as God commanded, for we believe the destroying angel will come, as he has said, but it is surely unnecessary to put any blood on the door, for God sees everything, and knoweth them that are his."

In another cabin, the father is distressed because he has a deep emotion about his sins and God's plan of salvation. It seems to him that God's word should read, "When I see your feelings I will pass over you." However, he doubting slays the lamb, and puts the blood drops on the door, saying "I cherish a hope that we may be saved." "Cherish a hope" exclaims his wife; "a hope of what? God has promised to save all who trust and obey, who slay the lamb, and put out the mark of the blood. You 'cherish a hope' that God will not lie? His promise is ground for glad assurance. What he has said is as good as done."

Midnight! The loud outcries of bereavement come from Egyptian homes afar, and nearer sounds the beating wings. At the door of the disobedient moralist the death angel cries, "You knew your duty, and yet did it not. At the door of the formalist he says, "Obedience is better than sacrifice. Wherever the blood drops have been put upon the door in obedience, though with little faith, those within are safe, though assurance makes a happier feast than a faint hope.

This Passover story is, first and foremost of all, an interpretation of redemption, which means the purchase of the soul. Redeemed by Blood means emancipation from slavery of one who could not free himself. Sin is, in a very real sense, a bondage. A threefold emancipation is needed from (1) the guilt, (2) the power, (3) the love of sin. This emancipation the sinner cannot himself accomplish. Every hour he is bound to live the best life he can live by divine help. Hence he has no hours in which to atone for sinful hours. Only the red coin of the Saviour's sinless heart can pay the price of his redemption. Nor is there an power, except an indwelling Christ, mighty enough to hold down sin in these future hours. And it is but a strife, and no freedom, to resist sin while still desiring it. Only "love divine, all love excelling," can displace the love of sin, making him love what God loves, and hate what God hates.

The Lion of Judah can break every chain. And give us the victory again and again.

There is a suggestion of family religion, and also of the "bitter herbs" of affliction, which, taken as food in the Passover, suggested that the Hebrews had been blessed by "the bread of tears."

THE INSTITUTION OF THE LORD'S SUPPER AT THE PASSOVER FEAST

faultless. The 20th chapter of Ezekiel tells us they had been greatly corrupted by the idolatries and vices of their masters. It was not their goodness, but God's grace that saved them in unmerited mercy. Not on the score of "worthiness" were men admitted to the Lord's table, even in that first Passover, but through obedient faith. No doubt the very simplicity of the conditions of deliverance stumbled many of the Hebrews, who were probably as reluctant as when Christ calls them to "believe and receive and confess him."

The Needle's Eye

BY FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

A NEW SERIAL STORY WRITTEN EXPRESSLY

Chapter II.—A Mysterious Stranger

DURING the three days in which the dead woman lay in the back room of the undertaker's shop in Tacitus Four Corners, all the countryside emptied itself before the door. Solemn-faced farmers with their wives; children on their way to school; grimy young women and grimmer young men, operatives in the cotton actory across the river; old people scarce able to drag their bodies from the warm nooks and corners where they dozed away their vacant days, one and all found their way into the bare little room dignified for the nonce by the terrible name—morgue.

There had been set on foot, as a matter of course, certain official inquiries, which had led up, after the frequent manner of official inquiries, to the dead wall of the unknowable. A vast number of excited rumors and gossiping surmises ended at the same impassable point. If the white mystery in Erastus Winch's barn had been dropped there out of the icy arms of the form, its story could not have been more deeply shrouded from prying eyes.

Eliphalet Dundor—familiarily known on ordinary occasions as Liph—was disposed to regard the present "sad occasion" as an auspicious event in his business career. As coroner and undertaker, his professional pride had been deeply gratified by the prominent position in the eyes of his fellow-citizens which he now occupied. He wore uninterruptedly his most impressive air of perfunctory solemnity—becoming, tempered with alert politeness, together with his official suit of black clothes.

In the front of the shop certain elaborately trimmed coffins were displayed, at which the visitors cast curious glances as they passed in and out of that other room, where lay the cold presence of the dead.

"Walk right up, ladies an' gentlemen, an' view these elegant goods at your leisure," said Mr. Dundor, with a professional wave of his hand. "Now that you've taken a look at her you really can't afford to go away without seeing how comfortable we can make the dear departed here in Tacitus Four Corners. There's only jest one thing we're certain of, ladies, in this vale of sorrows—we must all die some day or another, each an' every one of us. An' whilst we're survivors it's the greatest of all earthly comforts to feel that the dear departed is laid away by one that knows how to conduct the arrangements so 't you may say it's a pleasure to be the corpse." Many of the women shed tears excitedly as they left Mr. Dundor's emporium. It was unanimously conceded to be "more interestin' than a reg'lar fun'ral."

The short December day was drawing to its close with a gorgeous pageant of crimsons and purples which streamed far across the wintry land, kindling the village eaves and windows into gem-like splendor. His celestial radiance penetrated the dusty window-panes of Mr. Dundor's shop and mingled with the uncertain light of a smoky kerosene lamp, which, for convenience sake, was placed on the upturned lid of a pine coffin. After the active duties of the day the worthy undertaker had permitted himself the relaxation of a short clay pipe stuffed with malodorous tobacco, the while he "set up" a receptacle of the poorest and commonest kind for the meek figure which lay in the shadows beyond.

The article upon which Mr. Dundor was industriously engaged differed widely from the fantastic affairs which he had displayed to the admiring public earlier in the day; a combination of wood shavings, euphemistically termed excelsior, with certain scant breadths of eezy cambric of an unpleasant bluish white, were the simple materials with which he was lining the narrow box of ominous shape. It was, in short, a pauper's coffin, on which profits were reduced to a point which brought a commensurate scowl to the workman's forehead. At sound of a shrill tinkle, twice repeated, which marked the opening and closing of the outer shop door, Mr. Dundor laid down his hammer, and tiptoeing across the room, applied one eye to a knot-hole in the partition. After a brief reconnaissance he hastily divested himself of his overalls and extinguished his pipe.

The newcomer stood in the midst of the shop, glancing at him somewhat uncertainly over the collar of his great coat. He was a short man, much muffled up, and wearing a slouched hat pulled well down over his eyes; Mr. Dundor's alert eyes took in these details as he advanced on creaking tiptoe from the inner room. He bowed his sleek head with a tentative air of concern and sympathy. "Ah, my dear sir, good evening," he began, sucking in the corners of his lips with a windy sigh. "Was there anything—ah—I could do for you in the mortuary line, sir? A sudden bereavement perhaps—yes, yes!"

"There was a woman," said the stranger, in a harsh metallic voice, at sound of which the undertaker again bowed low, caressing the glossy knees of his trowsers with uncertain fingers. "A woman, found dead—in a barn, was it? Can't say; just chanced to see it in newspaper. Detained at your wretched junction for an

They were standing at the side of the dead woman, and the observant undertaker fancied that the aquiline features visible above the high coat collar quivered for an instant. "You don't happen to—ah—know this unfortunate young woman, do you, sir?" he repeated, with an insinuating smile.

The stranger turned sharply around. "What do you mean—confound you—by asking such a question?" he demanded in a low, fierce voice. "No, I don't know the woman. Why should I? Didn't I tell you what I came for? I came to please myself—to amuse myself! I said so, didn't I?"

"Oh—ah, yes, certainly, my dear sir; no offense intended; no offense whatever. But as coroner of this 'ere destrict, you know, an' with no evidence whatever—Sad case, very, an' a nameless child, too—a very sad an' melancholy occasion, to be sure!"

"A child!" interrupted the other, sharply. "But nonsense, I don't see it!"

"There was a child—yes, certainly. The child was living—is living, I may say."

"Humph!"

"I beg your pardon, sir. I didn't quite catch the remark."

The stranger turned his back upon the dead woman. "The funeral is to-morrow, I believe you said?"

"Yes, sir, to-morrow, at ten o'clock sharp; at the expense of the town—an' mighty little expense it is. I've buried the paupers in this 'ere community nigh onto twenty years, an' there ain't a dollar of profit in it—not a dollar."

The stranger glanced at the pine box with its cambric linings. "This is for her, I suppose," he said coldly.

"Yes, sir; an' a mighty roomy an' stylish coffin it is for a pauper. She'll lie quiet enough, once she's put away. I ain't sure it makes much difference to 'em anyhow; it's the survivors 'at's perticular. I can show you some elegant goods in all the latest styles, if you was interested in seein' 'em, sir."

"I have a fancy—mind you, it's a mere whim of mine to see this—this pauper buried decently," said the stranger, fixing his frowning gaze on the undertaker. "I should n't care to think of a dog in that!" He indicated the box with a slight gesture.

"If you—ah—happened to know anyone who is an acquaintance, or perhaps a relative of the deceased, you—" Mr. Dundor's eyes were roving inquisitively over the person of his visitor, but his words died away into an inarticulate mumble before the fierce look in the eyes above the high coat-collar. He rubbed his hands together apologetically. "You understand my position, sir, as coroner of this dees—"

"You heard what I said," broke in the stranger with a scornful shrug. "If you care to listen to what I say, then do so without remark, my time is limited."

"Certainly, my dear sir; I beg your pardon, I'm sure. I'm always ready an' anxious to ah—serve the b'reaved in any an' all—"

"Have the goodness to attend me. Place the body of the woman in your best casket. Seal it up and bury it without delay. What has passed between us need not be mentioned. This whim of mine—a mere fancy which came into my mind as I saw the woman—need not become common talk. Do you understand?"

Mr. Eliphalet Dundor's lean hand closed upon the roll of bills which the other man offered. "Very generous of you, sir, I'm sure. Nothing to be ashamed of, certainly. I—ah—quite understand, I assure you. Natural modesty of benevolent gent'man; prevent left hand knowin' right hand's doin's—eh? Everything shall be as you wish, sir; elegant casket, satin linin's, pillars soft and easy to the head, silver trimmin's, an'—"

The sound of the outer shop door as it shut to with a sharp protest from the rusty bell informed Mr. Dundor that he was once more alone.

"Curious circumstance—very," he muttered to himself. "If there had been any marks of violence on the body now, I should have felt justified in making an arrest hour or more. Concluded to pass away the time by looking the matter up."

"There was a woman; yes, sir; certainly—quite right. Found dead, as you say, sir, in a barn. Sad case—very. Funeral to-morrow."

"Let me see her."

"Certainly—to be sure. The public has been admitted as a matter of precaution—that is, with the view of securing some further evidence. I have the honor of being coroner of this destrict, sir."

The stranger made no comment; but a certain alertness in his manner called forth a further remark from Mr. Dundor. "We have not as yet succeeded in identifying the remains," he said, frowning and thrusting out his lips with an air of judicial wisdom. "Sad case—very. Now you don't happen to be a possible acquaintance of the deceased, do you, sir?"

Scepticism on the Retreat

INFIDELITY is the deadliest of all dead failures. All intelligent and rightly disposed people are coming back to the only catholicism. All the good that has ever been done has been done by the Christian religion. It has built all the asylums, endowed all the colleges, lifted all the observatories, and all that infidelity has ever done put together would not keep a country poor-house from extinction. Hence, up go the churches—more than a thousand of them in the United States in a year. So many adverse influences were hanging on the wheels of the Gospel chariot that it may have been somewhat impeded, but its future acceleration will more than make up for any slackened speed in the past. Since Christianity first began its march, it has made retrogression but once, and that in the fourteenth century. It fell back to five million Christians less than in the previous century, but in the following century it rallied and recovered all the ground lost, and ever since has been marching on, until it is estimated that there are four hundred and thirty million disciples of Jesus Christ. The music most appropriate for the church of God to-day is the grand march.

In all matters, let us cultivate the habit of expecting that the best things will happen. God has governed this world so long that he must know how to govern it. The Divine administration does not change every four years. From everlasting to everlasting. In his hand we had better put everything. It is not worth while for us to bother about the future. If some other God were to be enthroned, we might well be in trepidation; but the same principles of wisdom and goodness and love which have characterized the past will characterize the future. Limited monarchy will, after a while, cease, and Republican and Democratic forms of government will give way, and the world will swing clear around to the government under which it started, namely a theocracy, which is a government by the immediate direction of God. But without waiting for that political revolution, let us by loyalty of heart and life put ourselves under the Divine government. Let us belong to the theocracy now. The mountains may depart, and the hills be removed, kingdoms may dissolve, and the world may perish; but those who trust in God shall abide strong and happy forever.

Agnostic Institutions

SOME articles have appeared of late in the press regarding the splendid record made by agnostics in building up great institutions for men's welfare and happiness. It is claimed by these writers, that "it looks very much as if the agnostics were at least as generous as those holding opposite views." The additional claim is also made that "much of the money given to the Christian church comes from men who profess no religion." Then follows a list of the great charitable institutions that infidelity has planted in this country, viz.: Girard College, Philadelphia; Lick Observatory, California; and the gift of Wallace C. Andrews, of New York, of $5,000,000 to found a college of girls modelled after Girard. Then having exhausted the list, three in all, reference is made to Mr. Butland, of Toronto, Canada, giving $50,000 for a hospital. Then, in a short apology for the meagreness of the list, states that Mr. Ingersoll and Professor Haeckel, the apostles of agnosticism, died poor, and were not able to endow hospitals, colleges, or asylums.

It is the first time that infidelity, feeling the sting of reproach for its inhumanity, has made a reply to the home thrust that nearly all the great institutions of Christendom for the relief of suffering humanity have been erected by Christian men. That judging by their fruits, humanity would fare ill if left to the tender mercies of infidelity. It is beneath the shadow of the Cross and the Christian sanctuary that nearly all these institutions for suffering beings flourish and are supported. It is faith in God that generates true compassion for man. Judaism has erected some noble institutions, orphanages, asylums, hospitals and colleges, and all over our land can be seen these visible tokens of a generous philanthropy. We are not disposed to belittle what few deeds stand to the credit of such agnostics as Girard, Lick, or Butland, but modesty ought to have restrained their pens from saying, as S. M. Farrell does in the New York Tribune, "that the agnostics were at least as generous as those holding opposite views."

It will be a dark day for suffering humanity the world over when it has to depend upon agnosticism for the support of existing charities, or planting of new institutions for the assuagement of its woes and sorrows. Until infidelity can score a far grander record than at present, its best policy is a modest silence.

Adulteration of Food

IT is hard to get anything in our cities that has not been touched of commercial fraud. Many things once a deception have ceased to be such. Once when you bought milk of the average milkman, you supposed it to be milk; but now you buy it for water and chalk, and so there is no deception. But who can estimate the outrage practiced on the community by sugars mixed with ground glass, and baking powders with alum instead of cream of tartar. Let the official authorities of our cities put on sharpest spectacles and spy out and expose this dreadful despoliation of the people's food. Let pepper be pepper, and not brick-dust. Let coffee be coffee, instead of chicory and dried horse-liver. Let the bread that comes in from the bakery be the staff of life, instead of the sickle of death. It is generally supposed that the upper rooms of a house control the lower, the sitting room managing the kitchen. So persons denounce dietary discussion as belittling, or as the poet puts it,

Fat ox and goose itself oppose
And blaspheme custard through the nose.

There never was a graver mistake. The skill of the kitchen decides the health, the disposition, and, to some extent, the morals of the whole establishment. Many a battle has been lost through the dyspeptic twinge of the commanding officer. We masculines have yet to learn that the kitchen is the most important end of the household. If that go wrong, the whole establishment is wrong. Heavy bread, too great frequency of plum pudding, mingling lemonade and custard, unmasterable beef, have decided the fate of sermons, store-houses legislative halls and the destiny of empires. The kitchen knife has often cut off the brightest prospects. The kitchen gridiron has often consumed a commercial enterprise.

The Body Dedicated

IN these days when so many are indulging in physical culture, we sometimes wonder what use these people are going to make of their athletic attainments. I am far from throwing any discredit upon physical stamina. There are those who seem to have great admiration for delicacy and sickness of constitution. I never could see any glory in weak nerves or sick headache. Whatever effort in our day is made to make the men and women more athletic should have the favor of every good citizen as well as of every Christian. Gymnastics may be positively religious. Good people sometimes ascribe to a wicked heart what they ought to ascribe to a slow liver. The body and the soul are such near neighbors that they often catch each other's diseases. Those who never saw a sick day, have more to answer for than those who are the subject of lifetime infirmities. He who can lift twice as much as you can, and walk twice as far, and work twice as long, will have a double account to give in the judgment. How often it is that you do not find physical energy indicative of spiritual power? If a clear head is worth more than one dizzy with perpetual vertigo; if an eye quick to catch passing objects is better than one with vision dim and uncertain, then God will require of us efficiency just in proportion to what he has given us. Physical energy ought to be a type of moral power. We ought to have as good digestion of truth as we have capacity to assimilate food. Our spiritual hearing ought to be as good as our physical hearing. Our spiritual taste ought to be as clear as our tongue. But where you find a great many men who realize that they ought to use their money aright, and use their intelligence aright, how few men you find aware of the fact that they ought to use their physical organism aright? When every thump of the heart, there is something saying, "Work! work!" and lest we should complain that we have no tools to work with, God gives us our hands a feet, with every knuckle, and with every joint, and with every muscle saying to us, "Lay hold and accomplish something." But how often it is that men with physical strength do not serve Christ. They are like ship full manned and full rigged, capable of vast tonnage, able to endure all stress of weather, yet swinging idly at the docks; when these men ought to be crossing and recrossing the great ocean of human suffering and sin with God's supplies of mercy. How often it is that physical strength is used in doing positive damage, in luxurious ease, when, with sleeves rolled up and bronzed bosom, fearless of the shafts of opposition ought to be laying hold with all its might, and tugging away trying to lift up this sunken wreck of a world. It is a most shameful fact that much of the business of the church and of the world must be done by the comparatively invalid. Richard Baxter, by reason of his diseases, all his days sitting in the door of the ton yet writing more than a hundred volumes, and sending out an influence for God that will endure as long as the Saints' Everlasting Rest. Edward Payson, never knowing a well day, yet how he preached and how wrote, helping thousands of dying souls like himself "swim in a sea of glory!" And Robert M'Cheyne, walking skeleton, yet you know what he did in Dundee, and how he shook Scotland with zeal for God. Robert Hall, suffering excruciations so that while preaching he would have to stop and rest a little, and then getting up again would preach about heaven until the glories of the celestial city dropped on the multitude doing more work, perhaps, than almost any well man in his day. Oh! how often it is that men with great physical endurance are not so great in moral and spiritual stature.

Honest Merchants

WE sympathize more and more with the trials of bargain-makers. Go where you will, in town or country, you will find half a dozen shops struggling for a custom that would only keep up one. And so they are forced to undersell one another, and when they have got down the prices all they can by fair means, some of them feel forced to get them lower by foul.

Now, what a contest it is for our honest, upright merchants when they go out into this competition! From January to December, it is one long struggle. No quiet night for their tossing limbs, and their brain that will not stop thinking. Even the Sabbath does not dash back this tide of worldliness, for its wave dashes clear over the Church, and leaves its foam on the Bibles and the prayer-books. Men on salaries, men culturing the farms, do not understand that wear and tear of body and mind and soul to which our merchants are subjected this day, when their livelihood, their competency, the fortune, their business honor may all depend upon the uncertainties of the next hour. This perpetual excitement of the brain, this corroding care of the heart, this strain that exhausts the spirit, pushes many of our best merchants mid-life into the grave. They find that Wall Street does not end at the East River; it ends at Greenwood. Their life dashed out against a money sea. If there is any class of men who have my prayer it is these men who are toiling in merchandise to-day. O! I wish I could rub out some of the lines of care from their brow and I wish I could lift some of the burden from their heart. Take a long breath. God manages all the affairs of your life and he manages them for the best. Consider the lilies, they always have robes, and behold the fowls of the air, they always have nests. Bethink yourself of the fact that God did not intend you to be a pack-horse. Dig yourself out from the hogsheads and the shelves, and with faith in God throw your fretfulness and fears to the wind. You "brought nothing into the world, and it is certain you can carry nothing out."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Our National Policy

MANY and diverse are the important questions which await the action of Congress in the session beginning this week. By the time this issue of

HON. JOHN HAY, SECRETARY OF STATE

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in the hands of its readers, those questions will have been outlined in the President's message. It is reassuring to know, that although the hand that should have written it is now helpless in the grave, it will in all material matters be of the same character, and indicating the same policy, as the late lamented President would have presented. There will be no radical changes in our policy recommended, but only such developments as our growing national interests require. It is obvious that among the most conspicuous matters requiring the attention of Congress, will be some legislation tending to the protection of our public men and our free institutions from the dangerous class whose representative caused our national bereavement. This question may lead to a revision of our immigration laws, with the object of excluding the enemies of law and order who come to us from foreign lands. The subject of trusts and the labor troubles will also doubtless be considered, though probably without practical result. The advisability of granting subsidies for the development of our shipping interests ought also to be discussed. Most important also for the extension of our foreign trade will be a wise and careful consideration of the Reciprocity Treaties which have been negotiated. Happily the crucial subject of the Isthmian Canal appears to have been settled by Mr. Hay and the British Foreign Office in a way that will prove satisfactory to the Senate. It is reported that all the objections urged against the former treaty have been removed, and that a canal may now be built under American control. Mr. Hay deserves great credit for this difficult negotiation, as well as for the firm and dignified conduct of all our foreign relations. It was eminently welcome to the whole American people to learn from his recent speech in New York, how high this nation stands in the esteem of foreign governments, and how cordial are our relations with them. Mr. Hay added, with special reference to the South and Central American Republics, that our Government had no desire for their territories, that it wished the prosperity of all of them, and that peace and harmony might prevail among them. Our Government, he said, would not interfere in their disputes unless at the explicit request of both contending parties. It was also with a feeling of pride in our Government that the nation received his emphatic assurance that the administration is as incapable of bullying a strong nation as of wronging a weak one, and there will be no more a surrender of our own rights, than a violation of the rights of others. Such a policy, dignified, fair and equitable, will surely commend itself to Congress and to the American people, who, whatever their political party, are coming more and more to the belief expressed by the wise king:

Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people. (Prov. 14:34).

A Physician's Discovery

A well-known London physician has just sailed for England after making an extended tour through the United States. He had paid special attention to the mineral springs that he had visited during his tour and had analyzed their waters. He made the astonishing discovery that with one unimportant exception, there is no curative spring in Europe that is not in existence in this country. "In going," he said, "from one end of the United States to the other, I have kept a record of the qualities of the medicinal waters I have found and I am certain that every variety, with one exception, that we have in Europe is to be found here. If the people knew of them there would be a great decrease in the number of invalids who cross the Atlantic every year to take the treatment at the various spas. They might go for pleasure or amusement, but there is no need for them to go for medicinal waters while they have so abundant a supply at home." People in all times have made a like error in spiritual things. It is not necessary to go far or to do some great thing to receive healing for the soul, but only to believe on Christ.

Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? Or, who shall descend into the deep? The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart; that is, the word of faith (Rom. 10:6-8).

Recovery from Cancer

Many hopeless sufferers will be cheered by the news published by the New York Herald, in an interview

mitted to the treatment has proved incurable, and the cause in that case was constitutional weakness, which prevented a thorough application of the rays. Dr. Gilman says that the rays, pouring light and electricity through the diseased parts kill the germs, at the same time stimulating the activity of recuperative powers. All that is necessary besides the rays is medicine to supply material for rebuilding the normal tissue. Dr. Gilman believes that in the near future the application of the rays will become general in all cases of cancer and the disease will be robbed of its terrors. Precious as light was always known to be, no one until recently seems to have suspected that any application of it could have curative powers. The ancient prophet, however, told us long ago that moral and spiritual maladies would yield to the light that may be had from God.

Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thine health shall spring forth speedily (Isa. 58:8).

Why the Power Failed

The street lights and the electric railroads of the western part of New York State, which derive their power from the apparatus at Niagara Falls, were suddenly cut off one day recently. The lights on the streets went out and all the trolley cars stood still. A fuse in the power house was burned out at the same moment thus complicating the trouble. Considerable delay occurred in locating the scene of the difficulty. It was ultimately found to be at Hoffman, a village west of Lockport. A man was sent there to ascertain the cause of the break. He found that it was due to the body of a cat which was lying across the wires. The animal had evidently climbed a pole, probably to look for birds. With its feet on one wire and its tail sweeping the other, it reached a place where the insulation was imperfect and instantly it fell dead while ten thousand volts passed through its body. It fell across the two wires and remained there, thus causing what the electricians call a short circuit. The animal's body was burned to a crisp. As soon as it was removed from the wires, the telegraph and telephone service and the surface cars received power and operations were resumed. It shows how slight and insignificant a cause may derange a mighty power and cause a suspension of its beneficial action. We easily recognize this fact in material matters, but are apt to forget it in our spiritual concerns. A lack of faith, or a sin that we call venial, may prevent even Almighty power effecting the benefit of an individual or a community. The Son of God himself found his infinite power to bless paralyzed by the unbelief of the people.

He could there do no mighty work, and he marvelled because of their unbelief (Mark 6:6).

BRIEF NOTES

Renewing subscribers will confer a great favor on the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if, when renewing, they state that their subscription is a RENEWAL, or attach, if convenient, the yellow date tab to their letter.

Dr. David H. Greer, rector of St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, has been unanimously elected Bishop of the new diocese of Western Massachusetts. It is not certain that he will accept, as he is reluctant to leave the work he is doing in his present parish.

A Press despatch announces that Dr. George Granhaft, nephew of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Vienna, and his entire family, have been converted to Protestantism.

The Protestant Episcopal Special Convention of the Diocese of Long Island has chosen as successor to the late Bishop Littlejohn, Dr. Frederick Burgess, Vicar of Grace Church, Brooklyn. The choice of the delegates, it is said, was Dr. Huntington, of Grace Church, New York, but as he positively refused to allow his name to be presented to the Convention, it was necessary at the last hour to make another selection. Dr. Burgess is well known and highly respected in Brooklyn, and his elevation to the Bishopric meets general approval.

An earnest appeal for help has been issued by the Mayor and prominent citizens of Thomas, W. Va. An extensive fire broke out on Nov. 12, and before it was brought under control, it had destroyed the homes and property of more than one thousand persons. They took refuge on the hillside, where they suffered much from cold and rain. They need help to start the world anew. Contributions will be thankfully received by Mr. W. A. with Dr. John E. Gilman, professor in the Hahnemann Medical College, in Chicago. The professor has been using the Roentgen rays in cancer cases for a year and a half past, and has cured over fifty cases by their means. One of them was a severe case of cancer of the face, which, as it affected the brain, was a very dangerous case. The patient, after being under treatment for two months, is now nearly well and is leaving the hospital. One man was so grateful for the recovery of his wife that he has presented a very valuable apparatus to the hospital. Only one patient who has sub-

When You are Engaged

WILLIAM and Evelyn met at a party, and were mutually attracted. They pursued the acquaintance, belonging to the same set of people, and having friends in common. A few months went by, and their engagement was announced.

Had they been ready to marry very soon, all would have gone well, but William's salary was too small, and his position too uncertain, to let him think of marriage for several years. Evelyn had no desire to be bound down by wifely cares, and the period of betrothal is a very pleasant one until the novelty wears off. There came a day, when months had grown into years, that Evelyn discovered to her dismay, that she was dreading the long evenings with William. They had discussed every subject under the sun. They had read a great many books. They had no common object to bind them, as the married have, in the new home, and they were drifting apart. Having made the mistake of sitting up too late, evening after evening, Evelyn's beauty became eclipsed—she grew thin and pale. Her people began to find William somewhat in the way, particularly as in the exclusive fashion peculiar to lovers, the two monopolized the parlor every night in the week, and seemed to find the others de trop if they came in and staid longer than a few minutes.

Nobody was surprised when, at the end of five years, the engagement was broken by mutual consent. Eventually both Will and Evelyn found other mates, but they had wasted, in an unavailing experiment at loving, some of the most precious elixir of youth. Both were disillusionized, and neither would ever again be as enthusiastic as had once been the case.

When you are engaged, plan to be married soon. Be satisfied to begin in a very modest way. You do not need superfluities. Before you are engaged, think soberly of life and its responsibilities. Ask yourselves if you are moderately sure to be contented together during the wear and tear of maybe fifty years? Trust God to guide you, and enter into no engagement without prayer.

Buttons and Strings

Housekeepers might save themselves a great deal of trouble, if, when shoes, gloves, and other articles of wearing apparel are purchased, the precaution were taken to re-sew the buttons and strings. These things have an exasperating trick of flying off and loosening at the most inconvenient moment, as they are seldom carefully finished by those who make them. A needle and thread used by the wife and mother before garments are worn, so that the connections will never become separated when they ought to be firm, will minimize domestic friction. We are ashamed of ourselves that so slight an accident as the loss of a shoe-button can upset our equanimity, yet when the yawning place convicts us of untidiness, and spoils our costume, we can scarcely avoid showing some vexation.

The provident woman keeps on hand a button bag in which she has a store of buttons of assorted sizes and descriptions. Tape, hooks and eyes, cord, needles and thread furnish her work-basket, and she is ready for any emergency.

Two or Three Secrets of Success

"Of course, a good deal depends on what you call success. Money-making is not the only thing. One must have a standard. Money not honorably earned is a curse and not a blessing."

The old aunt looked into the face of the young-niece. The latter twirled her fingers.

"Money is a great convenience, Aunt Mary."

"Yes, that I grant. But I have always thought that there might be success worth having in merely making a living, keeping out of debt, and having a little to leave when one died. In these days you hear of such great sums; people forget that it is failure to spend their whole time in toiling, to heap up, when, in the natural order of things, they must leave it all, and never have much enjoyment. The successful man or woman is the one who gets most real pleasure going along and who does the most good. That's my notion."

"You are a dear, but you are old-fashioned," said the niece.

Tidiness

In the matter of tidiness in dress, very little matters tell for better or worse. Take, for example, the stray locks which refuse to be caught up in the coil at the back of the head. The tidy young lady catches them up with a small back-comb, or fastens them with invisible hairpins, or with a little circular or oval pin, which is ornamental, while the careless sister leaves them to stray over her collar or meander across her stock. The most beautiful head of hair is ruined in its effect if the back of the neck looks scraggy and neglected. Some women

THE PETS OF THE FARM

THERE are few pets more popular on a farm than the frisky young calves, whether they are Jerseys, Guernseys, Alderneys, Shorthorns, Durhams, or some other breed. They quickly learn to know their young mistress, and by many dumb tokens show how fond they are of her. Our artist has chosen a pretty group for his picture—one that will be familiar in many farm homes.

never smoothe out their eyebrows, and always have a distraught expression in consequence. Attention to the finger-nails points the difference between daintiness and slovenly indifference. A shoe that has lost its buttons, a glove that needs mending, a skirt which shows dangling fringes instead of a trim binding, and, in brief, any carelessness in the accessories of costume, convict one of untidiness, at once inelegant and inexcusable.

THE FOUR WINDS

THE wind o' the West,
I love it best.
The wind o' the East,
I love it least.

The wind o' the South
Has sweet in its mouth.
The wind o' the North
Sends great storms forth.

Taken together, all sorts of weather,

The four old fellows are sure to bring

Hurry and flurry, rush and scurry,

Sighing and dying, and fitting and flying,

Through Summer and Autumn and Winter and Spring.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Appearing to Advantage

MY children never show off to strangers. They always appear at a disadvantage when I am most anxious to have people think well of them."

The speaker's tone was plaintive. She had just said good-day to some callers whom she had desired to impress with the elegance and order of her home. The children had rushed in and out of the parlor noisily, slammed the outer doors, had a quarrel in the porch, and generally misbehaved while the visitors were there. Just before they took leave, the baby had fallen down stairs. She was not much hurt, but she made a great outcry. The call was "a scene of confusion and creature complaints," and the poor hostess was mortified and distressed.

"Phebe," said her cousin Ruth, "may I give thee two bits of counsel? There is too easy with the children when thee is by thyself. Then, thee allows every sort of conduct, rude, thoughtless, or whatever, without any reproof. So, the children are not to blame if they go right on in the same free and noisy fashion when thee has company. If thee had laws, and the family minded them, when alone, all would be right when there were friends here."

"Oh, yes, Cousin Ruth, I know that," said Phebe, "but I haven't any discipline, and the children are not naughty, only full of spirits and very restless. And I don't want them to be self-conscious. They'll scramble up somehow."

Cousin Ruth, being a wise old lady, said no more. But she was right. Only the household that is polite when in its own borders and by itself, is sure of being well-mannered on extraordinary occasions.

And I'm not sure that the mother was altogether wrong. We do make children bashful and awkward and self-conscious by criticising too severely their deportment before strangers. The best way is to show them constantly a really beautiful example of serenity, and to remember that good manners spring from a kind heart.

Snubbing As Disciplinary

Discipline is by many of us limited to penalty, but it has a wider meaning—it implies training, and it is training which moulds men. Fathers and mothers often snub their boys, roughly refuse their requests, or make fun of their performances, under the impression that they are thus disciplining them to endure life and its trials. This is a great mistake. A boy at fifteen is sensitive to ridicule, and dreads a snub. Its reaction is seen in his own brusqueness, and in his manner to younger companions. I heard a lady the other day call attention in a crowded room, to a boy's unbecoming neck-tie. "It is hideous," she said, "and makes you look like an Indian." When remonstrated with, she said, "Oh! Dave needs to be snubbed. It does him good."

I am sure it never does any one good, least of all a growing boy, to be treated uncivilly and rudely. And the effect is equally disagreeable on the one who snubs, making him or her unbearably arrogant and arbitrary.

AUNT PRUDENCE PAYSON'S CATCH-ALL

—JACK. Have you no mats and scrapers at your house? I am amazed that you should wish to bring mud upon your mother's clean floor.

—ILL-TREATED WIFE. Bear with your husband as long as you possibly can. If he is breaking down the morals of your children, pick them up and run away, but not till you are sure that you have exhausted every means for the man's reformation.

—A PERPLEXED MIND. A man may be compelled to work on the Sabbath, if he is engaged as a driver or conductor on a street car. When he has a Sunday off, he will, of course, go to church. A girl who loves him will not refuse his company on account of his occupation.

SUNDAY ON AN AMERICAN WARSHIP

Supplying Good Reading to the "Jackies" after Service on Deck

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE

As far as possible, Sunday is observed as a day of rest on board a man-of-war. The first Sunday of each month is general muster-day, when all hands are to pass, one at a time, by the commanding officer, to be inspected by him after each name has been called out by the paymaster of the ship. On that Sunday, the Articles of War are also read by the First Lieutenant, or, as he is better known—the Executive Officer. Then, after the Captain has inspected the ship, the officer of the deck gives the order: "Watch below, rig church!" This is done on the gundeck. When all the benches are arranged, word is sent to the officer of the deck, that "church is rigged." Then, at sea, the colors are hoisted, above which goes the white triangular pennant, with a large Roman cross in the centre of it, known as the "Church Pennant."

THE "READING HOUR" ON THE WARSHIP'S DECK

Then the boys are marched below, where the Chaplain is at the desk. On a raining ship, all of the apprentices are compelled to attend church. In port, both watches attend, but at sea, only the watch below, as the other watch is required on deck, to attend the sails in case they are needed. On the Monongahela, there is a very fine boy choir, consisting of fourteen members, all possessing excellent voices. At the services, all the lads, as well as the officers, are most attentive, and it is a real pleasure to address such a sailor audience. After church, the boys have a half-hour or so before dinner is served. At 1.30 P.M., Chaplain Jones is always on deck with a good supply of reading matter for the crew, which generous friends have sent to him before leaving port. The boatswain's mate is ordered by the officer of the deck to call all hands to the port-side of the quarter-deck if they wish any reading matter, where the Chaplain will give it to them. Down the deck they all come with a run. On a recent Sunday, the Chaplain of the Monongahela gave out 400 CHRISTIAN HERALDS from the 600 copies which had been sent to him before the ship left Newport. To show how eager the boys are to get this kind of reading matter, the photographs here shown are with the hope that all who can spare magazines or good books will send them to the General Secretary of the Naval branch of the Y.M.C.A., Sands street, Brooklyn, who will see that they are sent to the various ships.

The photographic illustration on the first page, shows the sailor boys receiving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from the Chaplain. Other photographs are of groups about the decks reading them, and, as one can see by their position, enjoying them, too. There are two papers always welcome to the sailor man: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and Ashore and Afloat (the latter, by Miss Agnus Weston, of the Royal Sailors' Rest, Portsmouth and Plymouth, England).

When the pictures were taken we were about 600 miles from Gibraltar, and hoping to reach that port some day the following week. We are a sailing vessel, and we depend entirely upon the winds, but thus far have done exceedingly well.

Famine-Swept Shensi

In a cable despatch from Sian (Sigan) the capital of Shensi, China, dated Nov. 16, Mr. Francis H. Nichols, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's special correspondent, announces his arrival at the chief centre of suffering. The despatch says: "The condition of the province is truly appalling. The whole country presents a picture of desolation. One year's deaths from famine, in Shensi alone, are over 2,500,000. There will be great need during the coming winter. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's relief work makes a most favorable impression on the Chinese officials and people here."

There are many thousands of orphan children in Shensi, whose parents have perished in the famine. These will have to be provided for, and the problem is now being considered by the authorities. Unless something is done for these helpless sufferers, a very large proportion of them will be sold into a slavery which, in the case of the girls at least, will be worse even than death itself.

WHEN you buy and use Royal Baking Powder you have the positive assurance that your food raised by it is not polluted by alum, lime, or any of the adulterants common to other powders. At the same time the use of Royal will give you the finest food at the lowest cost.

WORKING FOR CHRIST AT NINETY-SIX

SOME five years ago, Mrs. Gideon Scofield, of Castile, N. Y., a devout Christian, over ninety years old, made a promise.

She is now 96, and how faithfully that promise has been redeemed is told in the following words from a letter sent by a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"Mrs. Scofield is a poor woman, yet her consecrated offering to the missionary cause consists of knitting 404 pairs of worsted mittens, which she completed on her 96th birthday; 394 pairs have been sent to mission and orphan institutes. While spending a few weeks at a friend's house in 1895, Mrs. Scofield said to some missionary associates that she would knit, 'free of charge, all the yarn that the society would furnish,' little dreaming of spending more than six years, at her time of life, in the fulfillment of this promise.

Besides this self-imposed task, she has performed her home duties, as she lives alone. She puts into each knit mitten a little leaflet, which she feels may bring some soul to Christ or influence some young life. Her simple work affords her deep satisfaction, and she says she feels that her life 'has not been lived in vain.'"

Imperialism of Christianity*

Men of Many Races and Tongues and Creeds
Becoming One Kingdom by Loyalty to Christ

WHAT a marvelous thing when we consider its foundation and progress, is that society which Christ described as the Kingdom of God. As he said, it did not come with observation. The historians of that time passed it over as a matter of no importance. After its divine Founder left it, a full muster of its members brought together only one hundred and twenty persons. Yet now, more than five hundred millions call him Lord. Not only in number, but in influence, the growth has been prodigious. The leading nations in the world to-day are the Christian nations. True, those nations are often inconsistent and unchristian in their policy, and a large proportion of the individuals who make up the nation, are men whose lives are not governed by Christian principles; but the fact remains that they are called by Christ's name. Who would have thought it possible that in any lapse of time that little company would grow into so mighty a host? Still more unlikely that their principles would become, as we see them to-day, the dominating principles in the world's affairs. With the mightiest nations in the world, there is no stigma of a policy so fatal to it, as to prove that it is unchristian, and there are thousands of the people in those lands, who would quit their political party, sever their party allegiance, if they found that their party was controlled by men who set at defiance the principles of Jesus of Nazareth. Yet it has not been by legislation, nor by the power of the sword, that this progress has been effected, but by the inherent power of the truth working in the minds of men.

So much has already been accomplished. What of the future? The Divine Founder of our faith had a conception which does not now seem so improbable as it seemed when he uttered it. "I if I be lifted up," he said, "will draw all men unto me." We find that he does. Wherever Christ is proclaimed in simplicity and faith, converts are won. The power that in the early centuries brought men into his kingdom is still at work, and is as effective now as it was then. Its greatest triumphs are yet to come. There are many reasons for expecting them. One of the most conspicuous is the adaptation of the heathen religions to Christian thought. As was noticeable in the Parliament of Religions held here some years ago, the presentation of the Buddhist, Hindoo and Mohammedan faiths was almost unrecognizable by the stay-at-home adherents of those faiths; many of them repudiated the presentation that was made at Chicago by their representatives. The reason was, that the leaders have been unconsciously affected by Christian principles and now give prominence to the articles of their faith in harmony with those principles, and are slowly dropping those antagonistic to them. The heaven of Christianity is working in the meal, the world over, and it seems now as if the time must come when the preachers of other faiths will discover that it is Christianity they are unconsciously preaching, and will not be satisfied any longer to hold Christianity without its Christ. When that time comes, multitudes will be added to the kingdom in a day. Then, too, so much of the pioneer work—always the most weary and discouraging part of the work—has been done; the seed has been sown and the harvest will be unprecedented.

What will the kingdom be? Imperialism has come to be an unpleasant word with us. The spirit of our institutions is opposed to our ruling subject peoples, or of our holding under our sway unwilling populations. But what if our imperialism consists in such wise and benignant rule, that the unwilling peoples come to recognize the justice and beneficence of our government and ask for its continuance? That will be the condition which will usher in the imperialism of Christianity. Christ has no unwilling subjects. He rules only where his rule is desired. And he is content to wait. His servants are making him known everywhere and testifying that under his rule, alone, true happiness is to be found. Slowly, but surely, his spirit is permeating society. Even men who are not enrolled in his kingdom are applying his principles to their social relations. Our hospitals, our social settlements, our benefactions to suffering peoples show that the spirit of brotherhood is taking in the whole world and accepting the duties involved in that relationship. But far closer is the kinship of the family of Christ. That fact, too, was long forgotten, or ignored, but of late years it has come to recognition. We have not and, perhaps, never shall get rid of the various folds, but we are realizing now, more than ever before, that the flock is one, under one Shepherd. This is a most hopeful sign. The people of the kingdom are men of many creeds and of many races and tongues, but they are united in allegiance to their King. Thus the vision of the prophet is being fulfilled. The kingdom that shall never be destroyed has been set up, and even at this day it is the greatest of all the kingdoms. The dream of the conquerors of the Assyrian, of Alexander and Caesar and Napoleon, of a world-wide empire, is being realized by the Prince of Peace. No monarch has ever had so many subjects as he, and none have ever had subjects so loyal and devoted. Imperial it is and must ever be, for it is loyalty to him that is the one bond uniting all its varied components.

yes, to be sure, an arrest! But everything was quite regular; young woman, identity unknown, found dead—froze. Nothing out of the way or suspicious in freezing. Any young woman similarly situated would have froze. Sad case—ery. Ah."

Mr. Dundor had climbed to the high stool behind his desk during this soliloquy; the roll of bills lay spread out before him in the light of the smoky lamp. "Ah," he repeated, rubbing his hands as he eyed the crisp green notes, "very generous indeed—very handsome! What a pity not to speak of the matter."

"It would get into the papers," he said, smiling pleasantly to himself. "Something like this—say: 'Mr. Eliphalet Dundor, the well-known coroner and undertaker of Tacitus Four Corners, receives visit from mysterious person, who insists upon paying handsomely for funeral of the unknown woman found dead in that township. Mr. Dundor is a prominent citizen and active business man in this thriving village. We visited his elegant emporium at the Corners yesterday and give the story in his own words.' If there's money to advertise in—he—he!" he chuckled. "I'd get a plenty of it without paying the printer a red cent."

This brought him back quite naturally to the agreeable presence of the greenbacks on the desk before him. "It'll pay my expenses," he muttered, "and leave a handsome margin. There's the money from the town besides. I'll have to take that or they'll ketch on to this 'ere curious circumstance."

He arose, lamp in hand, and walked slowly to the front of the shop; the long shadows of the coffins danced grotesquely on walls and ceiling, mingling with that of Mr. Dundor's own spare shape. "This 'ere 's too big for her," he muttered; "they ain't no sense in wastin' room on folks that ain't called on to move. Besides, ol' Mr. Snell's ripenin' for a better world, an' he's a hefty man. If I have to set up one like this we can't have no fun'ral to-morrow at ten; can't fetch it nohow under a day an' a half. That black cloth case 'ud do, but I as good as promised to set that one side fur Mis' Turner, an' I don't like to disappoint her; her second husband's buried in one similar to it. The Lord knows I can't afford to play fast an' loose with a big fambly like the Turners an' all of 'em onhealthy."

His mind reverted to the meek presence in the back shop. "She ain't goin' to dictate 'bout it, I guess," he said meditatively, as he tiptoed softly to the side of the dead woman. "All any of 'em ask is to be put away comfortable."

The smoky lamp shed a feeble glimmer on the pathetic young face framed in its masses of red-brown hair. "I'll miss my guess if he had n't put eyes onto her before," said Mr. Dundor. "But she ain't dressed suitable to be laid on white satin whoever she is; an' I'm legally bound to stick to my contract with the town." He turned with decision, and, setting the lamp in its former position, resumed his operations on the narrow pine box of ominous shape.

It was growing bitterly cold in the little back room, but great drops of moisture stood out on the workman's forehead. "Stylish an' roomy," he repeated to himself, with a furtive glance at the quiet figure in the shadows, "an' there ain't no su'vivors."

A CLEAR TRACK TO HEAVEN

from Keenan, the Gospel Engineer and his Unique Addresses—Leading a Revival

ONE of the most trusted employees of the Lackawanna Railroad is Tom Keenan, better known as the "Engineer Evangelist." Since Tom's conversion, many years ago, he has rarely missed an opportunity of serving the Master who redeemed him from sin. He is in great demand as a speaker at evangelistic services, and his simple, earnest eloquence never fails to services in the same safe way in which he runs his engine. He has held soul-winning meetings at the East Avenue Baptist Church, Long Island City; Methodist Church, Port Washington; Congregational Church, Wading River, and in the Methodist churches of Babylon, Whitestone and Port Jefferson. He occupies the pulpit with far more ease and grace than the average pastor could occupy his "cab." "When he old his audience and to touch all hearts. Revival services were lately held in the Methodist Church of Patchogue, Long Island, in which the Rev. John Maynard (is pastor), under the direction of Secretary Nason Jones, the Long Island Railroad Y. M. C. A., and spiritual results have been most gratifying. Tom Keenan was the principal speaker at these meetings. At the first gathering, six young people openly confessed Christ and decided to begin the Christian life. As the movement grew, the evangelist, in his own direct and forcible way, preached repentance, conviction and confession of sin, and conversions multiplied.

Tom's appeals frequently savor of the railroad vernacular. He searches the track, sees danger ahead and on every side of the inner, and points out and interprets the various signals. He frequently switches his arrows off the main line to tell them in a direct and unobtrusive way of Jesus and his mission. Trackmen, switchmen, oilers, conductors, engineers, stokers, ticket sellers and others, always listen with deep interest when he speaks, as he talks "straight along the line" and reaches their hearts. He conducts

At the close of a three-service Sunday at Patchogue, a conductor and a brakeman were anxious, but would not accept Christ. Engineer Keenan took train with them next morning, and while making the run from Patchogue to Brooklyn, both were won over to the new allegiance.

Tom carries the Gospel with him to the stations, the round-houses and the repair shops, where he can meet the men face to face. He was engineer for many years on the main division to Buffalo; but in order to have more time to serve Christ, he gave up the "long run," and now has his regular run on the Chester Branch, to which he returns after the leave of absence granted him expires.

A Mountaineer Evangelist

How Dan McIntosh, Once a Desperado, was Won to Christ

DAVID once said he was a "wonder to many." Paul said, "By grace I am what I am." Those who know Dan McIntosh have found that the wonders of redemption are still seen, and the miracles of grace have not yet ceased. Dan, of Kentucky, was born thirty-eight years ago, on the Troublesome River, in the darkest Cumberland. There was not a railroad within a hundred miles, nor a church in nearly as many, nor a qualified preacher or teacher within several days' journey of his home on the Troublesome. Dan was a grown man before he ever saw either. His father died when he was only two years old, and Dan was left to an indulgent old grandfather, who left the boy to himself generally. He went to a mountain "common school" for about two years, and learned to spell some easy words and read a little.

DAN MCINTOSH

School being irksome to his highland blood, he finished it in two years and entered the free life with "the boys" on the Troublesome. He was an apt student, and soon graduated in swearing, drinking, gambling, shooting, illicit distilling and fighting. His home in "Bloody Breathitt" was a congenial one. In twenty years over a hundred men had died violent deaths in that county. When twenty-three years old Dan concluded to marry, and found a loving and courageous mountain girl in Prudy Hogston, who took Dan for "better or worse," principally the latter. She proved a devoted and faithful wife, and stuck to Dan "through thick and thin," nursed his wounds, and raised a family of bright children. Seeking new fields, Dan moved over the mountain from the Troublesome, to the turbulent waters of the Quicksand River. Here he continued his reckless career until 1894. But God had "provided some better things" for Dan, doubtless in answer to prayer. He never forgets. In that year of grace, Rev. Dr. Edward O. Guerrant pitched a Gospel tent on the Quicksand, at a place known as Rousseau—a post-office, store and two other houses.

There was not one church along the fifty miles of the Quicksand, but there were many hundreds of sinners for whom Christ died, and Dan McIntosh was among them. To this cotton tent the untutored highlanders came in crowds, on foot, over mountains and across streams, and sat from 9 A.M. till 4 P.M. to hear the Gospel. The "old, old story" was new to them. They sat on rough logs, boards and rocks. The singing was led by Miss Ellen Converse, of Louisville, and little Anne Guerrant, who came with her father to play a little organ and help in the service. More than fifty persons publicly confessed Christ, and there was joy on the Quicksand. One day, "Uncle Nimrod" McIntosh (Dan's uncle), an old highlander, with his aged wife, came to beg Dr. Guerrant to let them join the church, and be baptized. The Doctor told them he must preach ten days before he opened the doors of the church. Uncle Nim insisted, because he lived across the river, and if it rained they could not get across, and they might not have another chance to join. The Doctor consented to make an exception of Uncle Nim and his wife. They came, and, like Zaccheus, "received Jesus joyfully," and took him back with them to their little mountain home.

Dan saw all this, and heard it. A life of reckless sin was behind him, but God and heaven and salvation were before him: "And he arose and came unto his Father." I need not say that loving Father met, embraced, forgave and saved him. From that day Dan was a new man. He turned away from all his evil ways, and served God as zealously as he had once served Satan. His hand and heart were converted: a warm heart and a strong hand, and both, and all he had, were dedicated to his service, who loved and died for him.

Always a "front man," he now became a front man in the Lord's work. He taught in the Sabbath School, conducted the prayer meetings, traveled over his native mountains and bore the "glad tidings" to his own perishing countrymen. "And all men did marvel," and many believed on Jesus for the saying of Dan. They knew he was a true, brave man, and all had respect for his honesty and sincerity, and he has won many souls to Christ by his walk and conversation. He was elected an elder in his church, and for some years has been employed by the Inland Mission (the Society of Soul Winners) as an evangelist to his own people.

The last time I remember seeing Dan, was at another meeting conducted by Dr. Guerrant, far up on the Quicksand, in a churchless country, in the big tent. The morning service began about 9 o'clock. Not long after that hour, I saw Dan and his devoted wife coming up the hill to the meeting. They had walked about twelve long mountain miles to church, across the almost inaccessible Caney Mountain. That is the kind of religion Dan got under the big tent on the Quicksand. He is still in service, trying to win souls to his blessed Master, who rescued him from sin and death.

If any one who reads this simple history feels moved to help Dan and fifty other faithful missionaries in the desolate mountains, let them write to Rev. Dr. Edward O. Guerrant, President of the Soul Winners Society, at Wilmore, Jessamine County, Kentucky. B. A.

A LETTER FROM MISS STONE

The first authentic letter from Miss Ellen M. Stone, the captive missionary, written since her captivity began, has been lately received. It is addressed to a young woman in Bulgaria, and is as follows:

"My Dear Little Sister—As the sun in all its splendor shines despite the rain falling on us from thick clouds, so great is my joy at having received your letter this morning. What a blessing your dear words bring to me and also to Mme. Tsilka, your countrywoman. To hear once more from the world awakens new life in us. We continually repeat in our hearts your assurance that our dear ones have not forgotten us, and are praying and working tirelessly for us.

"When your letter came, having received no help from any direction, our burden had become heavy indeed. Now we are lifted up with new courage and stronger faith in the Lord. I rely fully on the prayers and efforts of our friends, known and unknown.

"Remember me to all; present my loving greetings to your mother and family, and inform my co-workers that I do not cease to pray for them. I have written the particulars of our condition to

Mr. Dickinson and you may ask him to see my letter.

"We have preserved our general health, despite our trials. I rejoice in the permission which has just been accorded me to write to my dearest ones in America.

"This will be the second letter which I have been permitted to write, besides those to three persons in regard to our liberation. I hardly hoped to hear that my mother was yet alive. If you can write her a word of comfort, and also my brothers, God will bless you. Mme. Tsilka joins in grateful and affectionate remembrance. Lovingly,
"October 29." "ELLEN M. STONE."

Late news is to the effect that U. S. Consul General Dickinson has discontinued negotiations with the bandits, and left Sofia for Constantinople. The bandits have refused to accept less than the full ransom ($100,000) and have fixed Jan. 1, 1902, as the last date, after which, if the ransom is still unpaid, Miss Stone must die. A determined effort will now be made to save the heroic missionary.

LITTLE GUAM IS CHRISTIAN

"IN the name of God, we set up our banners, and he giveth the victory," was the exclamation of Miss Mary A. Channell, missionary to our tiniest colony of Guam in the Landrone Islands, when she landed there on November 27, 1900. It was just two weeks after the typhoon had visited and dismantled the island. The United States had hardly taken possession of these far-away islands during the Spanish-American War when plans were made to evangelize its people. Miss Channell, with the Rev. Frank M. Price and wife, were soon on the Pacific, with the message of God's story of saving grace. At Agana, a house was secured, and work began in this, the largest town of Guam, numbering 6,000 people. Guam, all told, has only 10,000 souls, so over half the people were near the mission. Besides, Agana, is the seat of government, and about all the Americans (numbering two hundred) are there. There is a small force of marines. The native prisoners taken in war are quartered at Asan, at the Presidio nearby. Miss Channell writes that the natives are a quiet, friendly people, fond of American rule. The Americans have brought to them freedom and education. Physicians, medicine and hospitals testify to the humanity and civilization which always follow the flag.

A NATIVE SCHOOL IN GUAM

"There may be," she says, "many and grave mistakes made by our Government, but more often there are grand and lasting benefits wrought for all."

Soon after the Americans took possession, two brothers returned from Honolulu to the home of their childhood. They were Christians, and they began evangelistic work at once among their relatives and friends. One, Luis Custino, brought with him his wife and daughter Rosie, and the latter opened a school and taught the truths of Christianity. Services were being held in the home of Joseph Custino, and when the missionaries from America arrived, they found an open door and a welcome from the earnest workers ahead of them. Custino's home has become too small for the growing church and Sunday School. The future is bright for aggressive effort.

Early Signs of Greatness

Even in childhood, the signs of true greatness of soul may be apparent. A Swedish boy fell out of a window and was badly hurt, but with clenched lips he kept back the cry of pain. King Gustavus Adolphus, who saw him fall, prophesied that the boy would make a man for an emergency. He became the famous General Bauer. A boy used to crush the flowers to get their color, and painted the white side of his father's cottage in Tyrol with such pictures that the mountaineers gazed in wonder. He became the famous artist, Titian. An old painter watched a little lad who amused himself making drawings of his pot and brushes, easel and stool, and said, "That boy will beat me one day." He did, for he was Michael Angelo.

WRITE RIGHT.

"Scatter decent, helpful things."

Good, philosophical Ras Wilson once said to a new reporter, "Young man, write as you feel, but try to feel right. Be good humored toward everyone and everything. Believe that other folks are just as good as you are, for they are. Give 'em your best and bear in mind that God has sent them, in his wisdom, all the trouble they need, and it is for you to scatter gladness and decent, helpful things as you go. Don't be particular about how the stuff will look in print, but let 'er go. Some one will understand. That is better than to write so dosh high, or so tarnashun deep, deep that no one understands. Let 'er go."

"So on the above plan," says M. W. Porter, of Topeka, Kan., "I will write what I know of Grape-Nuts Breakfast Food from personal experience. After a long period of indigestion and other disorders, with some misgivings, I took up the use of Grape-Nuts. Despite the hot weather I kept gaining in strength and mentally, a thing I had never done at that season of the year."

I found the food an excellent stimulant for the brain, and I could do more and better work than I had ever done. It was a revelation to discover how closely the brain and digestive organs were in sympathy with each other. Whatever retarded the work of one had a corresponding effect on the other, and the food that tended to put one in proper shape acted accordingly on the other. I know that my great improvement mentally and physically came from dispensing with unwholesome food and using Grape-Nuts liberally.

TYPE OF THE LAMB

The Christian Significance of the Passover

By MRS. M. BAXTER

THE central chapter of the Pentateuch in its significance is Exodus 12, as Isaiah 53 is the central chapter of the prophets, and both speak of the Lamb. The work of the Lamb slain is the foundation of all things for lost sinners, and he who is "born again" dates his new life from the time in which the work of the Lamb of God became a reality to his soul. No wonder, then, that the Lord spake to Moses and Aaron, saying, "This month shall be unto you the beginning of months; it shall be the first month of the year unto you."

God commanded Moses that the children of Israel should take each of them a lamb for his house, or for his house and his neighbor's, according to their number. It must be a male of the first year, and without blemish. Three days the lamb was to be kept, and on the fourteenth day of the month, at even, the whole assembly of the children of Israel were to slay each one his lamb. And the blood must be sprinkled on the lintel and two side-posts of the doors of their houses. Then they were to eat the flesh roast with fire, with unleavened bread, and with bitter herbs. Oh, how much this meant for God's people of old! How much it means for us! The cry of the children of Israel had gone up, and God had heard it, but they were yet in Egypt. Their enemies had been smitten with plague after plague, and yet their enemies lived. The deliverance which God had promised them was not yet theirs, and Pharaoh was more enraged against them than ever. God had seen their affliction, he had seen the oppression of the Egyptians; but he had not yet seen what could justify him in pardoning their sin in Egypt, and working for them a full deliverance. The first-born of Egypt were all doomed to die because of sin; but Israel also had sinned in practising the idolatry of Egypt; what could save them from being also smitten? God answers, "The blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where ye are; and when I see the blood I will pass over you, and there shall no plague be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt." The lamb was a type of the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. The blood of the lamb was a life poured out, bearing witness that it was spilt for a life forfeited by sin. God must see what satisfied his holy justice before he could work deliverance, that he might be himself just and the justifier of him that believeth.

The children of Israel were to eat the flesh of the lamb. The blood was their security from the destroying angel who would smite the first-born, but the flesh was to be life and strength for their journey, for they were to eat it with loins girded, with shoes on their feet, and a staff in their hand, and to eat it in haste: for a summons might come at any moment to depart, to turn their backs on Egypt, and to break utterly with their past life of sin, oppression and misery. What a lesson for us! How many there are who are satisfied to claim forgiveness by the blood of the Lamb, who yet do not eat his flesh and drink his blood! They do not see that the very escape from the destroying angel is inseparably connected with departure from the old order of things, that the Lamb is slain to be our life-power for a life of freedom from the past, and of power to do the will of God for the future. The children of Israel were not to sit down within the blood-sprinkled door; they must stand, ready for a journey, expecting to be on the move. They were to eat the flesh, not as a feast of pleasure and self-satisfaction, but as strength to obey. Bread unleavened, and bitter herbs, "the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (1 Cor. 5: 8), and the bitter herbs of "fellowship with his sufferings" (Phil. 3: 10), who died for us, are the inseparable accompaniments of feeding indeed on the flesh and blood of our Lord. The taking his life to be our life must run parallel with the hating and yielding up of our own life.

The eating of the Passover was a complete break with their old life. None of the plagues had so utterly separated the children of Israel from the Egyptians as did the blood-sprinkled doorways and the passover feast. No more communication could be held between them and the Egyptians until the signal for departure was given, and then the separation was final. No one might "go out of the door of his house until the morning" (ver. 22).

Pharaoh had had his warning, but even after all he had seen of the power of the God of Israel, his heart was hardened, and he still resisted God. But now death itself had entered his palace, and the heir to the throne lay dead. And, moreover, from every house came the wail of the Eastern mourner. A great cry went up, and with one accord the king and his people urged the children of Israel to depart with their children, their flocks and their herds—all which Pharaoh had tried to keep—and all that they had. And the children of Israel asked of the Egyptians jewels and clothing, and they obtained all they asked. "Only go," was their one petition, "and take all you will."

THE PRESIDENT'S DEATH-BED HYMN

FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

DEAR EDITOR:—In your issue of recent date, you have "The story of the authorship of a favorite hymn—"Nearer, My God, to Thee." It may not be known to many of your readers, that there are two hymns beginning with the same verse and line, "Nearer, My God, to Thee." The first one, by Rev. Harvey Ganse, D.D., late Secretary of the Board of Education, of the Presbyterian Church, who just before his death, deeply impressed with the fact that Mrs. Adams' hymn did not meet the wants of a large number of believers, accepted the first verse of her hymn, and added to it three others, which express clearly and fully their Scriptural views and contribute more satisfactorily and profitably to their private and public devotions. It is, therefore, unknown to which of the two hymns our suffering and dying President referred. As between the two—taking into account that Mr. McKinley was not only a man who "Feared God and kept his commandments;" but, as is well known, accepted the Lord Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world, it is likely, certainly possible, that it was Dr. Ganse's hymn, and not Mrs. Adams' he referred to.

In the opinion of the writer, it is very doubtful whether he referred to Mrs. Adams' hymn, which fails to express the faith of one accepting the atonement of Christ for the sin of the world by the sacrifice of himself. I herewith send you a copy of Dr. Ganse's precious hymn at ought to be substituted everywhere. My hymn book and in private and public worship, for Mrs. Adams' hymn, which so lamentably lacks spiritual sentiment and devotional help.

Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer, to Thee!
Even though it be a cross
That raiseth me,
Still all my song shall be,
Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee!

Nearer, my Lord, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee,
Who to Thy cross didst come,
Dying for me!
Strengthen my willing feet!
Hold me in service sweet,
Nearer, O Christ, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee.

Nearer, O Comforter,
Nearer to Thee,
Who for my absent Lord,
Dwellest with me!
Grant me Thy fellowship!
Help me each day to keep Nearer, my Guide, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee!

But to be nearer still,
Bring me, O God!
Not by the visioned steeps
Angels have trod,
Here where Thy cross I see,
Jesus, I wait for Thee,
Thence evermore to be,
Nearer to Thee!

Drink Degrading the Savage Race

The Rev. John G. Paton, missionary to the New Hebrides, now returning to his mission fields, has forwarded a petition to President Roosevelt and Congress from the Presbyterian General Assembly of Australia in behalf of the speedy enactment of the Giffitt-Lodge bill, to forbid the sale of intoxicants and rum to uncivilized races in the Pacific Islands. The bill was approved by the President and by Committees of both Houses of Congress and received a majority vote in the House on the last day of the last Congress, but failed to become a law. Dr. Paton has extended tours in the United States examining how missionary work in the New Hebrides has been hindered by American traders who sell the natives both rum and weapons, and added with drink, they use these guns to kill each other, and sometimes to kill missionaries and even the children in the missionary orphanage. Dr. Paton writes: "Last mail tells us of eight persons shot at one station, two at another, and so on through all the group. The murderers got their ammunition for nearly all these murders from a United States trader living there."

PINEY WOODS.

Healthful, but Not Always Curative.

To go to the piney woods is a help, but if one carries along the bad habits of food and drink that have caused sickness, the piney woods will not produce a recovery.

Coffee drinking caused blindness in a Virginia gentleman, and his remarkable experience is worth reading. "I have been a coffee drinker since my earliest remembrance. If I missed coffee at a meal it brought on headache. This should have shown me that I was a victim to a drug habit. Finally, wakeful, restless nights came on. After dinner I was always drowsy, and after sleeping would waken stupid and morbid, and felt as though I had been drugged, and when this feeling wore off nervousness and restlessness would set in until I drugged myself with coffee again.

At last my eyesight began to fail. Some of the best optical specialists agreed that I had an affliction of the optic nerve, and after two or three years' treatment my eyes slowly lost their power, and I became almost sightless.

I was advised to go to a piney woods near the sea in a most isolated place. This I did and lived there for two years without any visible benefit. I gave up all hope of recovery until last spring a friend expressed the belief that the coffee I drank was the cause of all of my trouble. He had been a slave to it and had been unable to find relief until he quit and took up Postum Food Coffee.

His experience startled me and I decided to try the change, although I had but little faith in its merits. My first cup of Postum proved delicious and was a great surprise. It was evidently well made. I had not the slightest trouble in leaving off coffee, for the Postum filled its place perfectly.

During the past six months I have gained in flesh, my sallow complexion has become clear, and my eyesight gradually improved until now I am able to read and write. My mind is once more clear and active, and I no longer suffer from sleepless, nervous spells. You can imagine I feel grateful for my restoration. W. Harold Fenton, Brighton, Va."

JEWES OF TANGIER WATCHING FOR THE STAR OF THE MESSIAH (AFTER DU NOUY'S FAMOUS PAINTING)

Watching for the Messiah's Star

The Ancient and Beautiful Custom Still Survives Among the Jews of Morocco

TANGIER is the most important port on the coast of Morocco, and is the diplomatic centre in which are united all the representatives of foreign governments having relations with Morocco. Strange and unnatural impressions are created in the traveler, who, for the first time, visits this Moorish City. Although the genius of Europe has taken there the taste for civilization, introducing with energy, a great many modern reforms, the seal of barbaric custom is still visible. Little streets, narrow, tortuous, with irregular pavements, many of them covered over, the majority dirty, where there are ugly structures with very low doors, and mere slits for windows, hidden away between buildings of modern structure, magnificent hotels, legations and the offices of the foreigners. This is Tangier, the capital, and the most prosperous of Moorish cities.

A MOORISH CHIEF

Among the inhabitants is a large Jewish element, following the Moors, yet finally having distinct national individuality. The commerce of the interior is controlled by Moors and Jews, although there are some Europeans engaged in various lines of business. El Zoco (The Great), the principal market, is the point where, on Thursdays and Sundays, one meets the Moorish vendors, who collect to sell their products. The adjacent country outside the city walls is occupied by a class of people poorly clad, many being in filthy rags, and all selling merchandise. Intermingled with this multitude are camels, horses, burros, sheep and cattle. Here and there jugglers amuse the crowds by exhibiting trained serpents, executing barbaric plays, giving discourses, recounting history and accounts of Arabia.

Civilization advances slowly in Morocco; nevertheless in Tangier it has progressed not a little. Catholics and Protestants have well established and flourishing missions, and also schools, churches, hospitals and other charitable institutions. The Protestant missions inculcate evangelical doctrines and practice love and care for all in need, without distinction of race or creed. They give much in charitable works, care for the sick, shelter the homeless and orphans, and teach by example Christian morality. Their doctrine and example are making a deep impression upon the native heart.

There are two empires which mark the ancient grandeur of the Mussulmans—one in Europe, the other opposite, on the Mediterranean's southern shore. Morocco offers peculiar attractions to the ambitions of Europe, and diplomacy has disputed long over its possession, although each nation strives to conceal its desire to possess it. Thus far the worshipers of Mohammed have been able to preserve the integrity of their territory on the African Continent, but the time is at hand when this barbaric power will be swept away. It would be a powerful bulwark for the nation that ultimately possesses it. Which shall it be—Spain, France or England?

J. MORENO TRIVINO.

Our photographs on this page are of special interest at the present time. The Jews of Morocco hold the belief that a little child, with its pure eyes, will be the first to discover the appearance of the long-expected Messiah. Accordingly at the appropriate season (after harvest), as indicated in the Hebrew prophecies, the devout assemble on the housetops to watch for the rising of the Star, which is the forerunner of the Messiah. With them they take the youngest child, the pet of the household (pas que-de cabanas)—who must be both perfectly formed and beautiful—and the little one is taught to look in the eastern sky for the heavenly presage of Christ's coming. This custom, the "chosen people" in Morocco, like the ancient Magi, have handed down through generations.

Concerning the Magi, Rev. Cunningham Geikie writes:

One tradition is beautiful. In the farthest East lived a people, who had a book which bore the name of Seth, the son of Adam, and in this was written the appearance of the Star of the Messiah, and the offering of gifts to him. This book was handed down from father to son, generation after generation. Twelve men were chosen who should watch for the Star, and when one died, another was chosen in his place. These men, in the speech of the land, were called "Magi." They went each year, after the wheat harvest, to the top of the mountain, which was called the "Mountain of Victory." At last the Star appeared, and in it the form of a little child, and over him the sign of the Cross.

Wonders of Blessing and Disaster

TEXT—JOEL 2: 30:
"I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth"

R. CUMMING—great and good man!—would have told us the exact time of the fulfilment of this prophecy. As I stepped into his study in London on my arrival from Paris just after the French had surrendered at Sedan, the good doctor said to me: "It is just what I had told you about France; people laughed at me because I talked about the seven horns and the vials, but I foresaw all this from the Book of Daniel and the Book of Revelation." Not taking any such responsibility in the interpretation of the passage, I simply assert that there is in it suggestions of many things in our time.

Our eyes dilate and our heart quickens in its pulsations as we read of events in the third century, the sixth century, the eighth century, the fourteenth century, but there were more far-reaching events crowded into the nineteenth century than into any other, and the last twenty years eclipse any preceding twenty. We read in the daily newspapers of events announced in one paragraph, and without any special emphasis—events which a Herodotus, a Josephus, a Xenophon, a Gibbon, would have taken whole chapters or whole volumes to elaborate. Looking out upon our time, we must cry out, in the words of the text: "Wonders in the heavens and in the earth."

I propose to show you that the time in which we live is wonderful for disaster and wonderful for blessing, for there must be lights and shades in this picture as in all others. Need I argue that our time is wonderful for disaster? Our world has had a rough time since by the hand of God it was bowled out into space. It is an epileptic earth; convulsion after convulsion; frosts pounding it with sledge-hammer of iceberg, and fires melting it with furnaces seven times heated. It is a wonder to me it has lasted so long. Meteors shooting by on this side and grazing it, and meteors shooting by on the other side and grazing it, none of them slowing up for safety. Whole fleets and navies and argosies and flotillas of worlds sweeping all about us. Our earth like a fishing-smack off the banks of Newfoundland, while the Majestic and the St. Paul and the Kaiser Wilhelm de Grosse rush by. Besides that, our world has by sin been damaged in its internal machinery, and ever and anon the furnaces have burst, and the walking-beams of the mountains have broken, and the islands have shipped a sea, and the great hulk of the world has been jarred with accidents that ever and anon threatened immediate demolition.

Seismic Convulsions

But it seems to us as if the last hundred years were especially characterized by disaster—volcanic, oceanic, epidemic. I say volcanic, because an earthquake is only a volcano hushed up. When Stromboli, and Cotopaxi, and Vesuvius stop breathing, let the foundations of the earth beware! Seven thousand earthquakes in two centuries recorded in the catalogue of the British Association! Trajan, the emperor, goes to ancient Antioch, and amid the splendors of his reception is met by an earthquake that nearly destroys the emperor's life. Lisbon, fair and beautiful at one o'clock on the 1st of November, 1755, in six minutes sixty thousand have perished; and Voltaire writes of them: "For that region it was the last judgment, nothing wanting but a trumpet!" Europe and America feeling the throb; one thousand five hundred chimneys in Boston partly or fully destroyed!

But the disasters of other times have had their counterpart in later times. In 1812 Caracas was caught in the grip of an earthquake; in 1882, in Chili one hundred thousand square miles of land by volcanic force upheaved to four and seven feet of permanent elevation; in 1854 Japan felt the geological agony; Naples shaken in 1857; Mexico in 1858; Mendoza, the capital of the Argentine Republic, in 1861; Manila terrorized in 1863; the Hawaiian islands by such force uplifted and let down in 1871; Nevada shaken in 1871; Antioch in 1872; California in 1872; San Salvador in 1873; while in 1883 what subterranean excitement! Ischia, an island of the Mediterranean, a beautiful Italian watering-place, vineyard-clad, surrounded by all natural charm and historical reminiscence; yonder, Capri, the summer-resort of the Roman emperors; yonder, Naples, the paradise of art—this beautiful island suddenly toppled into the trough of the earth, eight thousand merry-makers perishing, and some of them so far down beneath the reach of human obsequies that it may be said of many a one of them, as it was said of Moses, "The Lord buried him." Italy, all Europe weeping, all Christendom weeping, where there were hearts to sympathize and Christians to pray. But while the nations were measuring that magnitude of disaster, measuring it not with golden rod like that with which the angel measured heaven, but with the black rule of death, Java, of the Indian Archipelago, the most fertile island of all the earth, is caught in the grip of the earthquake, and mountain after mountain goes down, and city after city, until that island, which produces the best beverage of all the world, produced the ghastliest catastrophe. One hundred thousand people dying—dead! Coming nearer home on August 31, 1886, the great earthquake which prostrated one-half of Charleston, South Carolina.

But look at the disasters cyclonic. At the mouth of the Ganges are three islands—the Hattiah, the Sundep and the Dakin Shabazpore. In the midnight of October, 1877, on all those three islands the cry was: "The waters!" A cyclone arose and rolled the sea over those three islands, and of a population of three hundred and forty thousand, two hundred and fifteen thousand were drowned. Only those saved who had climbed to the top of the highest trees!

Did You Ever See a Cyclone?

No? Then I pray God you may never have to see one. I saw a cyclone on the ocean, and it swept us eight hundred miles back from our course, and for thirty-six hours during the cyclone and after it, we expected every moment to go to the bottom. They told us before we retired at nine o'clock that the barometer had fallen, but at eleven o'clock at night we were awakened with the shock of the waves. All the lights out! Crash went all the lifeboats. Waters rushing through the skylights down into the cabin, and down on the furnaces until they hissed and smoked in the deluge. Seven hundred people praying, shrieking. Our great ship poised a moment on the top of a mountain of phosphorescent fire, and then plunged down, down, down, until it seemed as if she never would again be righted. Ah! you never want to see a cyclone at sea.

But I was in Minnesota, where there was one of those cyclones on land that swept the city of Rochester from its foundations, and took dwelling houses, barns, men, women, children, horses, cattle, and tossed them into indiscriminate ruin, and lifted a rail-train and dashed it down, a mightier hand than that of engineer on the airbrake. Cyclone in Kansas, cyclone in Missouri, cyclone in Wisconsin, cyclone in Illinois, cyclone in Iowa! Never such cyclonic disturbances as in our day. And am I not right in saying that one of the characteristics of the time in which we live is disaster cyclonic.

But look at the disasters oceanic. Shall I call the roll of the dead shipping? Ye monsters of the deep, answer when I call your names. The Ville de Havre, the Schiller, the City of Boston, the Melville, the President, the Cimbria, the Oregon, the Mohegan. But why should I go on calling the roll when none of them answer, and the roll is as long as the white scroll of the Atlantic surf at Cape Hatteras breakers! If the oceanic cables could report all the scattered life and all the bleached bones that they rub against in the ocean, what a message of pathos and Tragedy for Both Beaches!

In one storm eighty fishermen perished off the coast of Newfoundland, and whole fleets of them off the coast of England. God help the poor fellows at sea, and give high seats in heaven to the Grace Darlings and the Ida Lewises and the lifeboatmen hovering around Goodwin Sands and the Skerries! The sea, owning three-fourths of the earth, proposes to capture the other fourth, and is bombarding the land all around the earth. The moving of the hotels at Brighton Beach backward one hundred yards from where they once stood, a type of what is going on all around the world and on every coast. The Dead Sea rolls to-day where ancient cities stood. Pillars of temples that stood on hills, geologists now find three-quarters under the water or altogether submerged. The sea, having wrecked so many merchantmen and flotillas, wants to wreck the continents, and hence disasters oceanic. Alas for Galveston and other cities almost drowned!

Look at the disasters epidemic. I speak not of the plague in the fourth century that ravaged Europe, and in Moscow, and the Neapolitan dominions, and Marseilles wrought such terror in the eighteenth century, but I look at the yellow fevers, and the choleras, and the diphtherias, and the scarlet fevers, and the typhoids of our time. From Hurdwar, India, where every twelfth year three million devotees congregate, the caravans brought the cholera, and that one disease slew eighteen thousand in eighteen days in Bossorah. Twelve thousand in one summer slain by it in India, and twenty-five thousand in Egypt. Disasters epidemic. Some of the finest monuments in Greenwood, and Laurel Hill, and Mount Auburn are to doctors who lost their lives battling with Southern epidemic.

But now I turn the leaf in my subject, and I plant the white lilies and the palm-tree amid the night-shade and the myrtle. This age no more characterized by wonder of disaster than by wonders of blessing. Blessing of longevity; the average of human life rapidly increasing. Forty years now, worth four hundred years once.

Blessings of intelligence: The Salmon P. Chases and the Abraham Lincolns and the Henry Wilsons of the coming time will not be required to learn to read by pine-knot lights, or seated on shoemaker's bench, nor will the Fergusons have to study astronomy while watching the cattle. Knowledge rolls its tides along every poor man's door, and his children may go down and bathe in them! Free libraries in all the important towns and cities of the land. Historical alcoves and poetical shelves and magazine tables for all who desire to walk through them, or sit down at them.

Blessings of quick information: Newspapers falling all around us thick as leaves in a September equinox. News three days old, rancid and stale. We see the whole world twice a day—through the newspaper at the breakfast-table, and through the newspaper at the tea-table, with an "extra" here and there between.

The Roll of Blessings

Blessing of Gospel proclamation: Do you not know that nearly all the missionary societies have been born within a hundred years, and nearly all the Bible societies, and nearly all the great philanthropic movements. Christianity is on the march, while infidelity is dwindling into imbecility. While infidelity is thus dwindling, the wheel of Christianity is making about a thousand revolutions in a minute. All the copies of Shakespear and Tennyson and Disraeli, and of any ten of the most popular writers of the day, less in number than the copies of the Bible going out from our printing-presses. A few years ago, in six weeks, more than two million copies of the New Testament purchased, not given away, but purchased, because the world will have it. The most popular book to-day is the Bible, and the mightiest institution is the Church, and the greatest name among the nations, and more honored than any is the name of Jesus.

Wonders of self-sacrifice: A clergyman told me in the Northwest that for six years he was a missionary at the extreme North, living four hundred miles from post-office, and sometimes, the thermometer forty degrees below zero, he slept out of doors in winter, wrapped in rabbit skins woven together. I said: "Is it possible? You do not mean forty degrees below zero?" He said, "I do, and I was happy." All for Christ. Where is there any other being that will rally such enthusiasm? Mothers sewing their fingers off to educate their boys for the Gospel ministry. For nine years no luxury on the table until the course through grammar school and college and theological seminary be completed. Poor widow putting her mite into the Lord's treasury, the face of emperor or president impressing upon the coin not so conspicuous as the blood with which she earned it. Millions of good men and women but more women than men, to whom Christ is every thing. Christ first, and Christ last, and Christ forever.

Why, this age is not so characterized by invention and scientific exploration as it is by Gospel proclamation. You can get no idea of it unless you can ring the church bells in one chime, and sound all the organs in one diapason, and gather all the congregations of Christendom in one Gloria in Excelsis. Mighty camp meetings! Mighty Ocean Groves! Mighty Chautauquas! Mighty conventions of Christian workers. Mighty general assemblies of the Presbyterian Church. Mighty conferences of the Methodist Church! Mighty associations of the Baptist Church! Mighty conventions of the Disciples' Church! Mighty convention of the Episcopal Church!

All dead churches wake up! Throw back the shutter of stiff ecclesiasticism, and let the light of the spring morning come in! Morning for the land! Morning for the sea! Morning of emancipation!

Morning of Light

and love and peace! Morning of a day in which there shall be no chains to break, no sorrows to assuage, no despotism to shatter, no woes to compassionate. Blessed Christ, descend! Scarred temple, take the crown. Bruised hand, take the sceptre! Wounded foot, step on the throne! "Thine is the kingdom."

These things I say because I want you to be alert. I want you to be watching all these wonders unrolling from the heavens and the earth. God has classified them, whether calamitous or pleasing. The divine purposes are harnessed in traces that cannot break, and in girths that cannot slip, and in buckles that cannot loosen, and are driven by reins they must answer.

THE PHILADELPHIA BUILDING

THE COTTON PALACE

THE LITTLE PIPER

THE SOUTH'S GREAT EXPOSITION OPENS

FOR weeks past, visitors from far and near have been flocking to the beautiful old City of Charleston, that they might be there in good time for the opening of the South Carolina Inter-State and West Indian Exposition.

There could hardly be a happier selection of place for a Midwinter Fair than this quaint historic town, where flowers bloom in open gardens the year round, and where a bowl of roses on the Christmas dinner-table is not an unusual sight. The city's claim to interest, however, is not merely an æsthetic and climatic one—it is not based simply on fragrance of blossoms, the stately beauty of palms, nor the balmy breezes blowing in from the Gulf Stream with "strange tropic warmth and hints of summer seas." Industrially, the place is of sufficient importance to command for any exhibit within her gates the sober interest of the business world; she is the chief commercial city of the second largest cotton manufacturing State in the Union; and the centre of a great cotton-raising district. Within twenty miles is the only tea farm on the Western Hemisphere. South Carolina rice is the finest rice in the world; South Carolina Sea-Island cotton is the finest cotton. At present, the Government is constructing a mammoth navy yard there, the place being one of the strongest strategic points on the Atlantic.

The site of the Exposition, a tract of about one hundred and sixty acres of land, is within the city limits, a little over two miles from the business centre. It is easily reached by electric and steam cars, and by water transportation, the grounds having a frontage of about 2,000 feet on the Ashley River, which affords at this point anchorage for the largest vessels. Architects and landscape gardeners have been busily occupied for many months laboring to produce effects that will please the eye of the most exacting visitor. The Ivory City, as the Exposition is called, because of the prevailing tint of its buildings, possesses one unique feature, which no money, skill or labor of man could provide, in the form of the magnificent live oaks—the product of the centuries—draped with trailing gray moss, which add to the picturesqueness of the grounds.

As the Electrical Building at the Pan-American was the climax of the architectural scheme, so at the Charleston Exposition, the Cotton Palace, covering 50,000 square feet of ground, and with its dome rising 160 feet above the Court of the Palaces, is the dominant feature of Charleston's Fair. One of the most interesting textile exhibits ever seen in this or any other country is housed within. The other buildings of chief importance are the Commerce and Agricultural Palaces, Mineral and Forestry Building, Administration Building, Auditorium, Woman's, Art, Negro, Transportation and Machinery Building. Twenty-four or more States and cities have special buildings or exhibits. Maryland's headquarters is a very beautiful type of the old Colonial mansion, reached by a graceful bridge which spans Lake Juanita. Philadelphia's fine building of course has one attraction with which nothing else can be put in competition—the old Liberty Bell. Illinois is handsomely established on lovely Lake Bonita. Oregon is keeping up her fine reputation won at Buffalo in agriculture, horticulture, forestry and minerals. The little white-tented city of the United States Marines was set up some time ago by a trim company of "Boys in Blue." For months before opening day, December 1, hundreds of cars were arriving every day, bringing exhibits from places as far north as Alaska and Canada, and from farther south than Guatemala. The opportunity afforded here for showing West Indian fruits and other products is of course an exceptional one. In the Art Department much fine work is displayed.

A unique and interesting feature of the programme for the inauguration of this fair was the religious service arranged for the Sunday preceding the regular opening exercises. According to the plan given out well in advance, the sweet bells of old St. Michael's Church and of the Lutheran Church would ring their chimes as announcement. In the schedule all denominations had representation, and Handel's grand anthem, "The Lord is my Strength," and Haydn's "The Heavens are Telling," rendered by the Exposition Chorus of one hundred voices, under the direction of Mme. B. H. Barbot, found place. The President of the Exposition, F. W. Waggener, the Director-General, John H. Averill, and their associates, have labored nobly to make the Fair a success. They, as well as the members of the Woman's Department, under the leadership of Mrs. Sarah Calhoun, are entitled to congratulations on the result.

preach no fatalism. A swarthy engineer at one of the depots in Dakota, said: "When will you get on the locomotive, and take a ride with us?" "Well," I said, "now, if that suits you." So I got on one side of the locomotive, and a Methodist minister, who was also invited, got on the other side, and between us were the engineer and the stoker. The train started. The engineer had his hand on the agitated pulse of the great engine. The stoker shoveled in the coal, and shut the door with a loud clang. A vast plain slipped under us, and the hills swept by, and that great monster on which we rode trembled and bounded and snorted and raged as it hurled us on. I said to the Methodist minister on the other side of the locomotive, "My brother, why should ministers quarrel about the decrees and free agency? You see that track, that firm track, that iron track; that is the decree. You see this engineer's arm; that is free agency. How beautifully they work together. They are going to take us through. We could not do without the track, and we could not do without the engineer."

So I rejoice, day by day. Work for all to do, and we may turn the crank of the Christian machinery this way or that, for we are free agents; but there is the track laid so long ago no one remembers it, laid by the hand of the Almighty God in sockets that no terrestrial or satanic pressure can ever affect. And along the track the car of the world's redemption will roll and roll to the Grand Central depot of the millennium. I have no anxiety about the track. I am only afraid that for our indolence and unfaithfulness God will discharge us, and get some other stoker and some other engineer. The train is going through with us or without us. So, my brethren, watch all the events that are going by.

There is a house in London where Peter the Great of Russia lived awhile when he was moving through the land incognito, and in workman's dress, that he might learn ship-carpentry, by which he could supply the needs of his people. A stranger was visiting at that house: "What's in that box?" The owner said: "I don't know; that box was there when I got the house, and it was there when my father got it. We haven't had any curiosity to look at it; I guess there's nothing in it." "Well," said the stranger, "I'll give you two pounds for it." "Well, done." The two pounds were paid, and the contents of that box were sold to the Czar of Russia for fifty thousand dollars. In it the lathing machine of Peter the Great, his private letters, and documents of value beyond all monetary consideration. And here are the events that seem very insignificant and unimportant, but they incase treasures of Divine Providence and eternities of meaning which, after a while, God will demonstrate before the ages as being of stupendous value.

Those of you who are in mid-life may well thank God that you have seen so many wondrous things; but there are people alive to-day who may live to see the shimmering veil between the material and the spiritual world lifted. Magnetism, a word with which we cover up our ignorance, will yet be an explored realm. Electricity, the fiery courser of the sky, that Benjamin Franklin lassoed, and Morse and Bell and Edison have brought under complete control, has greater wonders to reveal. Whether here or departed this life, we will see these things. It does not make much difference where we stand, but the higher the standpoint the larger the prospect. We will see them from heaven if we do not see them from earth.

Years ago I was at Fire Island, Long Island, and I went up in the cupola from which they telegraph to New York the approach of vessels hours before they come into port. There is an opening in the wall, and the operator puts his telescope through that opening and looks out and sees vessels far out at sea. While I was talking with him, he went up and looked out. He said: "We are expecting the Arizona to-night." I said: "Is it possible you know all those vessels? Do you know them as you know a man's face?" He said: "Yes; I never make a mistake; before I see the hulls, I often know them by the masts; I know them all; I have watched them so long." Oh, what a grand thing it is to have ships telegraphed and heralded long before they come to port, that friends may come down to the wharf and welcome their long-absent ones! So to-day we take our stand in the watch-tower, and through the glass of inspiration we look off and see a whole fleet of ships coming in. That is the ship of peace, flag with one star of Bethlehem floating above the top-gallants. That is the ship of the Church, mark of salt water high up on the smokestack, showing she has had rough weather, but the Captain of salvation commands her and all is well with her. The ship of Heaven, mightiest craft ever launched, millions of passengers waiting for millions more, prophets and apostles and martyrs in the cabin, conquerors at the foot of the mast, while from the rigging hands are waving this way as if they knew us, and we wave back again, for they are ours; they went out from our own households. Ours! Hail! Hail! Put off the black, and put on the white. Stop tolling the funeral bell and ring the wedding anthem. Shut up the hearse and take the chariot.

Now, the ship comes around the great headland. Soon she will strike the wharf and we will go aboard her. Tears for ships going out. Laughter for ships coming in. Now she touches the wharf. Throw out the planks. Block not up that gangway with embracing long-lost friends, for you will have eternity of reunion. Stand back and give way until other millions come aboard her. Farewell to sin! Farewell to struggle! Farewell to sickness! Farewell to death! "Blessed are all they who enter in through the gates into the city."

Christmas Lesson on Wise Persians and Foolish Egyptians

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE International Lesson Committee has offered us a choice between the story of foolish Egyptians fighting against God at the Red Sea to their own destruction, and the story of the Persian Magi seeking the Christ under the star of Bethlehem. Both may well be studied in contrast, as the dark and light sides of the divine Shechinah cloud, which was a light to speed the Israelites in the crossing of the Red Sea, and black darkness toward the pursuing Egyptians that they might be held back in their mad career, and find a watery grave.

How came the Egyptians to be on the dark side? Pharaoh repented that he had let God's people go, and he started in hot pursuit after them. He made ready his own chariot, and took six hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt, and captains over every one of them. What a host was that! The chase was a mad one.

The Dark Side of the Pillar of Fire

They came in sight of God's people as they were encamped by the Red Sea. When the Israelites saw their relentless foes, they cried out to God for help, for of themselves they could go neither forward nor backward. God's banner over them was light—the pillar of fire. It moved forward, God rolled back the waters of the sea, and thus made a path by which they were to cross. The Egyptians were amazed at the sight, and they started to follow on. But there was no banner of light over them, but, instead, one of blackest darkness. They stumbled on, their chariot wheels strangely dragging. And when God, looking down from above, saw that they were all between the banks, he called upon Moses to raise his rod, that wonderful rod, that had been so much in evidence. As the rod was raised over the sea, the waters rolled to their accustomed place; and the great host of the Egyptians was drowned—the next morning their dead bodies were seen washed upon the shore. Pharaoh's overthrow at the Red Sea pictures the awful judgment that follows disregard of God's oft-repeated warnings. He had been called to duty as by fire-bells by the ten plagues. How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation as that which the Christmas chimes sound in our ears? We shall not escape. It will be dark about us. The bright side of God's love and mercy is for the penitent, for them alone is the Christmas message of "peace." As serious as was Pharaoh's disregard of God's warnings, and his final overthrow, let us not think that because judgment is delayed our sins are forgotten. "He that because often reproved hardeneth his neck shall suddenly be cut off and that without remedy." We sin against greater light than Pharaoh rejected when we disobey and disregard Jesus Christ. A man went to California to seek his fortune. His Christian wife, in her letters, often urged him to become a Christian, and he would admit that he ought to do so, but would say he was too busy to attend to it. He would give attention to religion, he promised, when he had made a hundred thousand dollars. The faithful pastor of the church that he sometimes attended urged the same duty, and he got the same excuse and promise. Again and again he thus put aside the pleas of wife and pastor. At length he was taken dangerously sick. The pastor called, and found him at the point of death. He spoke of the dying thief's deathbed repentance; but the dying man replied, in fierce self-reproach, "There is no hope in that. That dying thief had not been urged for years by a Christian wife and a Christian mother before her, and a Christian pastor after her, to live a Christian life." And with that despairing self-reproach, he sank in death, like Pharaoh in the waves of the Red Sea.

A wonderful song they sang in the morning and ever afterward, those people who had crossed over the sea under that marvelous banner of light. "Thou, in thy mercy, hast led forth thy people which thou hast redeemed." This was a part of their song. And Miriam, she who, when a child, had watched her brother Moses in his tiny bark amid the flags of the Nile, now in the strength of her womanhood, led the women with a timbrel in songs and dances, "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." Sometimes we hear music in the far distance, faintly, but growing louder as it comes nearer, until it bursts upon us with full force. The song of Israel redeemed from Egypt is the distant note of what will one day burst upon us in the song of the redeemed, the ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands, who shall gather about the throne of God to sing the song of Moses and the Lamb. If we are ever to hear that song we must keep on the side of the banner of light while we are in this world.

The Bright Side of the Pillar of Fire

Not in miracles alone, but daily, God in nature, takes side with the right. Some years ago a ship captain, whose employees were ambitious to have their ship first out of Buffalo on the breaking up of ice in spring, started his vessel as soon as the harbor was cleared of ice, supposing that the wind would, as often before, carry the ice up the lake, break it up, and disperse it, and so prevent all trouble from it. But when the ship neared the upper end of the lake the captain found himself between two great fields of ice, that on the right extending to the Canada side; that on the left, slowly but surely moving down upon them. The ship was not prepared for an Arctic encounter like this, and how to escape from their perilous position was an anxious question. But two courses presented themselves. The first was to land on the ice, and so make their way to the Canada shore. The mate volunteered the attempt. It was fraught with danger, but he succeeded in making the exploration, and in returning safely to the ship, but only to report that the ice was entirely detached from the shore, and that escape in this direction was impossible. The second method was to reach the open channel between the ice fields in the ship's boats; but this idea was soon abandoned, for, at the rate the ice was moving before the wind, it was very certain the two fields would meet long before the boats could reach the open water, and, if caught, they would be crushed like eggshells. Under these circumstances, the captain called the passengers, and as many of the crew as could be spared from the deck, into the cabin, made a plain statement of their danger, and of his entire want of power to afford them relief, and though not a professing Christian, said, "We are in the hands of God, if he does not interpose for us there is no help, no hope. If any of you know how to pray, I wish you would do so." The mate, a Christian man, prayed earnestly, while every head was bowed in solemn anxiety. After the prayer, the captain and mate went on deck, and saw that, during that moment of prayer, the wind had changed, and now, instead of blowing the crushing ice-field upon them, it was blowing the ship slowly, but surely, through that open channel. In the presence of that strange fact, the captain and mate uncovered their heads, and the mate, looking aloft at the nearly naked yards, said, "Shall I put some more canvas on her, captain?" "No," said the captain, "don't touch her, someone else is managing the ship." And so the unseen hand did lead them to the open water, and to their desired haven in safety. In the words of Dr. Washington Gladden:

And fierce though the fiends may fight,
And long though the angels hide,
We know that the truth and right
Have the universe on their side.

When Abraham Lincoln became President of the United States, many Abolitionists urged that he should at once emancipate the slaves. When he delayed, they chided him. Among those who did so, was an intimate friend, Richard Yates, a Senator, from Illinois. To him Lincoln replied with words borrowed from the Red Sea story: "Dick: 'Stand themselves with these promises of a Deliverer. Noble-hearted Persian astronomers, among whom some of the captives lived, heard these promises that the Son of God would come to save and rule the world, and that he had been called a "Star." They rightly thought that his coming out of heaven to bring light to the world as a Star would be proclaimed by some new star in the sky. At last, after long years of waiting, these wise men or magi, saw a bright star flash out in the sky, and knew in their hearts the Messiah had come. They therefore hastened to fit out a caravan of camels to follow the star, which they believed would lead them to this heavenly Visitor. We are not to think of them as coming right after the shepherds of Bethlehem, and while Jesus was still in the manger. They arrived at least forty days later, when Jesus and his mother had been moved into a "house." There is a tradition that they were three kings, one Caspar, a beardless youth of twenty, bringing incense for worship of Jesus as the Son of God; another, Melchior, sixty years of age, with long white hair, offering gold to Jesus as tribute to a King; the third, Balthasar, forty years old, offering myrrh, significant of the sufferings of Jesus as our Saviour. Let us think of them also as representing the three original races, one the Japhethites, another the Shemites, yet another, the children of Ham, typical of the world's final acceptance of Jesus as Lord and Saviour of all.

As they neared Jerusalem, the star was hidden for a time, and as they entered the gates where merchants and rulers sat about, bending low on their dusty camels, they asked the startling question, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" No wonder Herod, the bad king of the Jews, was "troubled" with fear when his guards reported the question, and "all Jerusalem" with glad expectation, as they were yearly expecting the promised Messiah.

If that same question, "Where is he that is born King?" were asked to-day by some prophet in a city hall, and board of trade, and ball room, there would be hardly less excitement. There is little recognition that Christ is the rightful king of politics and business and pleasure. But as sure as God's Word is true, "the holy city" is "coming down," in which the prayer of Christ is to be realized, for Christ could not have taught it in vain:

Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, as in heaven so on earth.

Herod pretended that he desired to know of the Scribes where this expected "King of the Jews" should be born, that he might "worship him," but in his heart he was plotting to kill him. The Scribes found this prophecy in Micah: "Thou Bethlehem out of thee shall he come forth unto me that shall be ruler in Israel." On that the magi set out anew for the village, only six miles away. Strangely, the Scribes did not take the trouble to go even so short a journey to learn whether the prophecy was fulfilled. Herod, however, remembered, and hardly had the magi presented their gifts to Jesus before his mother and Joseph were warned that Herod would seek to kill the child, and that they should carry him away to Egypt.

We shall miss the larger meanings of Christmas if we do not include in our thought the march of Christ down the centuries, each of which he has made better than its predecessor for women and children, and others as poor as he was, and his mother and the workman's household to which he belonged. The best Christmas gift we can receive is the "unspeakable gift" of Christ in the heart. The best gift we can give is the gift of body and soul, our two mites, to Christ. Here I give my all to thee freely, fully and forever.

"THE LORD OVERTHREW THE EGYPTIANS IN THE MIDST OF THE SEA"

still, and see the salvation of God' Abe: 'Let us be ready to obey God's orders promptly, whether it be to wait or to march, to 'stand still,' or 'to go forward.'"

Christmas in Prophecy and Promise

More than seven hundred years before the first Christmas, God pictured it so plainly to the prophet Isaiah in a vision that it seemed as if it had already come, and he exclaimed: "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulders, and his name shall be called Wonderful Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." Other scenes in the life which the Son of God was to live on earth were also pictured in Isaiah's visions, so that we can make quite a full life of Christ by putting together in the right order the red passages in Isaiah in the Red Letter Bible, which were quoted in the New Testament as prophecies of Christ. There were so many of these, and they were so vivid, that Isaiah has been called one of the evangelists, with Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. "Evangelist" means one who proclaims the Gospel, which is the "good news to the poor" that, through the coming of Jesus into the world and into men's hearts, the wrongs the poor have suffered from masters and rulers shall at last

THE IMPERIAL THRONE IN "THE FORBIDDEN CITY"

Taking Tea with Prince Ching

Our Special Correspondent Meets Earl Li's Successor—A Remarkable Interview
—The Prince's Generous Recognition of America's Aid in the Famine

SINCE the death of Earl Li Hung Chang, Prince Ching, the military Governor of Peking, has become the leading factor in Chinese affairs. Below is published the second letter from Mr. Francis H. Nichols, our special correspondent in China, which gives an account of a most interesting interview with Prince Ching at the capital:

PEKING, October 12, 1901.

Over a cup of tea in the reception room of his residence, Prince Ching to day talked with your correspondent about American relief for famine in China.

It is no exaggeration to say that Prince Ching is the most important character in the Chinese political life of to-day, and will continue to be until the arrival of the Emperor and the Court. Besides holding the position of head of the Foreign Office, Prince Ching's sphere of influence and power has been greatly enlarged of late by the infirmities and failing health of Li Hung Chung, who has begun to retire from active political life. Prince Ching is a Manchu of the blood royal. It was he, more than any other one man, who represented China in the tedious complicated indemnity negotiations recently concluded.

An interview with him is a thing not easy to obtain. Besides the ordinary obstacles which Chinese etiquette always places in the way of a meeting between a prominent official and a foreigner, the pressure of business under his charge has of late compelled him to almost entirely forego interviews, except on important matters of state. Yet when Major Conger, the United States Minister, sent word to Prince Ching that a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which had raised money for starving Shensi, wanted to see him, he at once acquiesced, and made an appointment for the following afternoon at his residence.

Prince Ching lives four miles from the American Legation, and as my visit was to be an official one, sedan chairs were substituted for the customary rickshaws. Mr. E. T. Williams, of the American Legation, kindly consented to accompany me and act as interpreter. There is a good deal more in the art of riding gracefully and with dignity in a sedan chair than one would imagine from a mere description of the vehicle.

The chair is so heavy and cumbersome that the four bearers cannot carry it any great distance without soon becoming exhausted, so that two extra bearers trot along beside it as a relay to relieve the regular men every half-mile or so.

An outrider on a pony precedes the procession, and continually shouts to passersby to get out of the way. Progress in a sedan chair, while very comfortable for the rider, is exceedingly slow. Every few minutes the front bearer gives a short "yow," and the poles are shifted from one shoulder to another, and just when you least expect it, the whole caravan comes to a halt while the relay takes the place of the most exhausted pair of bearers.

Peking is devoid of thoroughfares that can be dignified with the name of streets. There are only crooked lanes between the houses, in which, in many places, the rain of weeks ago still lingers in stagnant pools in the hollows. At times, the sedan chair creeps cautiously along a footpath in the shadow of a wall, and at others, sways from side to side in climbing the steep grade by which one street joins another. To move from the exact centre of your chair is to bring upon yourself a volley of Chinese warnings from the bearers that the "next time you do that" you will upset the whole party. Altogether, successful sedan chair riding is an art which has to be practised to be acquired.

After an hour's shouting and swaying and jostling through dirty lanes and around corners of the wall of the imperial city, our chairs were suddenly dropped in the dusty road before a large stone gateway, that marked the entrance to the residence of Prince Ching, where a Chinese captain and twelve soldiers were loafing about. They immediately sprang up and presented arms as we left our chairs, and passing through the gateway behind a Chinese secretary who spoke a few words of English, and who had been sent to receive us.

Across a big stone courtyard, and through a long row of offices, where a score of Chinese clerks were at work, we were ushered into a sort of drawing-room. In the centre of it was a little table covered with a white cloth, and behind it stood Prince Ching.

He is a man of medium height, apparently about sixty years old. His long goatee and thin moustache are iron gray, and so is the patch of hair on the back of his head above his pigtail. His forehead is slightly forward and his cheeks are hollow, bringing into prominence his high cheek bones. His eyes are larger and less almond-shaped than those of most Chinamen, and are bright and kindly at the same time. His lips are thin and compressed. Taken altogether, his is the sort of face one would turn to look at for a second time in any crowd in the world. He would be almost as striking a personality on Broadway as in Peking. This is the man who to-day is battling against the ablest diplomats of the West for the maintenance of the integrity of the Chinese Empire. It is on those stooping shoulders, covered with a purple blouse, that to-day rests very largely the future of his country.

Prince Ching motioned us to chairs at the white tablecloth, while a servant brought in little silver cups full of tea and a plate of cakes. With a manner which had in it not a trace of stiffness or formality, he began asking questions about the famine relief fund.

"Is this money that the American people have raised," he asked, "the gift of a few men, or has it come from many sources?"

Through the interpreting of Mr. Williams, I explained as best I could that the $60,000 forwarded to China's starving ones represented the Christian generosity and kindness of thousands of Americans. I told him that the homes of the givers covered a territory as vast as the Chinese Empire.

"And all of these have remembered China?" he said, meditatively. "It is a splendid, generous act. On behalf of our people, please convey to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD my thanks. Words (and he pointed to his lips) can hardly express the gratitude I feel. This relief for the starving in China will go a long way towards binding us closer to the people of the United States."

"It is a friendship of many years," he went on, "between your country and mine. I really doubt if any other nation would have remembered us in our hour of need as the Americans have done."

Prince Ching explained that there had been great suffering in Shensi, but that it was now very nearly at an end, owing to a recent fall of rain, but that in Shensi the famine

MISSIONARY HEROES TO THE FRONT

Two Families of Missionary Workers Going to Morocco in Faith in God's Support and Protection

FAITH in God and devotion to his service are displayed in a truly remarkable way in the lives of two families who sailed last week from New York. They are on their way to Tangier to preach the Gospel to the Moors. Knowing absolutely nothing of the language and very little of the country, poorly equipped with funds and with very slight prospects of future support, they went out serenely confident in the guidance and providential care of Him to whose service they have consecrated their lives. To the world, with its hard common sense, such a mission savors of reckless fanaticism. Yet the world owes much to such heroic souls. Only the reason that the great pioneer of missionary work gave for his life and his renunciation of honors and wealth, can be assigned for their act: "The love of Christ constraineth us." They know that they will have to endure hardship and discomfort and will imperil their health and perhaps their lives, but none of these things deter them, neither count they their lives dear unto them, if they can bring into Christ's kingdom souls now in heathen darkness that have never heard of him.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Weiss and their children, Mr. and Mrs. Curral and their children, form the missionary party. Such preparations as they have for their work was obtained in a little-known institution at Shenandoah, Iowa, which was established by Mr. C. S. Hanley some twelve years ago, to give instruction to persons desirous of preaching Christ in the slums of our own great cities or to the scarcely more ignorant heathen abroad. Mr. Hanley and his wife have similar strong faith in God's loving care. They have had in the twelve years past, fifty persons in their home. Without endowment, without regular income, they have carried on their work of preparing heralds of the Cross. Contributions have been sent to them by people who knew what they were doing and had some idea of their need.

Many a time during his sojourn with them, Mr. Weiss says, there has been neither food nor money in the house for the next meal, when they have risen from the breakfast table, but never once has provision failed when the need for it came. Thus their faith has been confirmed and strengthened by experience, and they are not afraid now to put it to a new test. Mr. Weiss says that in all, three hundred evangelists are now at work in connection with this institution, besides two missionaries in India, one in South Africa, and one in Alaska, all of whom look to God alone for the supply of their temporal wants. They are all strongly enjoined to work with any evangelical denomination, but on no account to organize a new sect.

This is not the first experience in missionary work that the little party has had. Mr. and Mrs. Curral, since leaving the institution at Shenandoah, have labored for seven years in the West chiefly in St. Louis and Kansas City, Mo. Like their Master, they preached the Gospel chiefly to the poor.

Mr. and Mrs. Weiss also have had some experience in city work. They have labored, too, in the foreign field. In December, 1894, they sailed from New York for South Africa. Arriving in Natal, they went at once to Durban, and began preaching in the streets of the city. Many of their hearers were acquainted with English, and when Zulus were present, an interpreter translated their utterances. They spoke frequently in the American Mission Church in Durban to large audiences. After a year spent in Durban in this work, they went inland. They traveled from place to place assisting the missionaries of the American Board at various stations in Natal, finally reaching the Mapumulo Mission, where they settled down. From this point they covered a large circuit in all directions, preaching in a large tent, which was carried with them by the natives from place to place. Mr. Weiss was greatly touched by the kindness of the people. The natives, he says, would come to him voluntarily, bringing provisions and fruits from their own farms and gardens, so that there was always an abundant supply of food. At the outbreak of the war between the British and the Boers, they returned to America, bringing with them as a trophy of God's grace a Zulu boy, ten years old, named Makanya, who is now at Shenandoah, being educated for missionary work among his own people. He is very docile and obedient, and has won the affection of all with whom he has come in contact. He is making excellent progress in his studies, and promises to be a useful servant of Christ. He is being fed, clothed, and educated, by the World's Faith Missionary Association, at Shenandoah, Ia.

During their stay in America, Mr. and Mrs. Weiss have labored in various parts of Kansas, Nebraska and Minnesota. In their call at this office shortly before sailing for Tangier, they left kindly messages for their friends in those States, who, they said, would be sure to get them if they were printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for they found this journal in all their homes. To all they bid a cordial farewell, begging that prayer may be offered for God's blessing on their labors in the unknown land to which they are going, and assuring all that they have unwavering and implicit faith in God's protecting care.

was still acute. This confirms the reports that have been received by Dr. Smith and the relief committee.

Prince Ching not only complied with alacrity to my request for his seal on my passport to insure my safe journey to Singan, but he also had written above it a long command to the viceroys of the provinces of Shansi, Shensi, Hoopah, and Honan, to provide me with an escort and every comfort within their power during my travels. He gave me his card, a big red piece of paper, on which was inscribed his signature in black characters.

"That card," he said through Mr. Williams, "is in itself sufficient to give you a safe journey anywhere in China." Besides all this, he promised to telegraph to the local magistrates along the route, notifying them in advance of the coming of a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Relief Fund. Prince Ching said that he had never had his photograph taken. I produced my kodak and asked for the privilege of a snapshot; he consented. The process of posing and of standing with the light in his face seemed to interest him immensely. He was not the international diplomat now, but a simple Chinaman in the presence of a contrivance he could not understand. He stood on the steps of his residence and smiled half incredulously, while I pressed the button. You can see the result. He clasped his hands in front of him, in the Chinese salutation, as he said good-by. The guard presented arms again, and we returned to our chairs and the American Legation.

All is now expectancy in Peking over the return of the Emperor and the Court. The forbidden city has been closed to foreigners for more than three weeks, and a guard of Chinese soldiers are stationed at the gates. Within the grounds hundreds of laborers are at work painting, plastering and patching, in order to, as far as possible, cover up the desecration of the invaders. The plaster of the huge entrance has been covered with several coats of red and yellow paint, to an extent that reminds one slightly of the effect at the Buffalo Exposition. The curious structure called the Chen Men gate has also been turned over to the Chinese. The Chen Men is a huge circular tower in the wall, through which one must pass in entering from the Chinese to the Tartar city. In it are four entrances. The one on the south is opened only once a year when the Emperor goes in state to worship at the "Temple of Heaven."

One could wish that his devotions were of more frequent occurrence, because the closed gate necessitates a detour to one of the side entrances over a road compared with which a ploughed field is smooth. Another force of men are repairing the breaches in the stone wall made by the artillery fire of the allies. All this is in order to carry out the delusion that the foreign troops inflicted no real damage on Peking and were finally compelled to leave because of the superior prowess of the Chinese army.

The Emperor, Empress Dowager and the Court have begun a royal progress from Singan to Peking. They are traveling slowly, and making long stops at the towns through which they pass, where they are received by the Taotais and Viceroy, and congratulated on their return to the ancient capital of the empire. At Kai Feng, in Honan, elaborate preparations have been made for a week of rejoicing, for it is there that the Empress will celebrate her birthday. Any Chinese imperial intention is always largely a matter of uncertainty to Western minds, and one hears all sorts of guesses as to what the imperial programme is. The opinion is expressed in a good many quarters that the Empress Dowager will not return to Peking for some time, but will remain at Kai Feng, while the Emperor returns alone to feel the pulse of the situation. Meanwhile repairs and alterations are in progress in the foreign quarter, which are rapidly transforming Legation street into a fort. Legation street runs west from the Chen Men Gate, parallel with the wall of the Tartar City, to what is known as the Hateman Gate, another large opening in the wall that separates the two cities of which Peking is composed. On the top of the wall, near the gate, the Germans are building a brick and steel platform for a heavy gun, which will command the entire section of the wall near the legations, and will be able to throw shells into any of the important strongholds of the Chinese. Barracks for additional guards are being erected in both the British and American compounds.

Recent events have at last decided the United States Government to own its own legation residence in Peking. For years the Stars and Stripes in the capital of China have floated over a compound which was rented property. At the west end of Legation street to-day, close to the Chen Men, is a vacant lot which is pointed out to every American visitor as the future home of this country's embassy. Alongside of it some gray brick buildings have now reached the second story of their construction. The gateway, with the letters U. S. in the keystone, indicates that they will be the new American barracks. Neither they nor the new home of the legation will be as imposing or extensive as the British, German or Russian buildings.

One hears golden opinions of Major Conger on all sides in Peking. An Englishman told me the other day that had Major Conger been in the service of Edward VII instead of Uncle Sam, he would long ago have been knighted and would now be writing K. C. M. G. after his name. Instead of that he is just plain "Minister Conger," always kind, always dignified, always keenly alive to his country's interests.

About half a mile from the Hateman gate, across the Slough, which by courtesy is called a street, is a huge shed of matting. Within it a score of stone-cutters are at work on the monument which the German Government is erecting to Baron Von Ketteler. It will mark the exact spot where he was murdered. From the lips of the secretary who was with Von Ketteler at the time of his death, I have heard the story of the tragedy. When the strain had reached the breaking point, the council of foreign ministers requested the Tsung-li-yamen to call upon them at an appointed time and talk over certain demands which they had made. When the yamen did not put in an appearance, Von Ketteler announced that he would go to them. He never returned. He was shot by a detachment of Chinese imperial troops. The officer commanding them, when captured by the allies a few months ago, said that Von Ketteler was killed in compliance with an order issued by Prince Tuan to kill any member of a foreign legation who might pass that way on that particular morning. Had any other of the foreign ministers accompanied Von Ketteler, they would undoubtedly have shared his fate.

One of the anomalies of the present situation in Peking is the temporary homes of the various missionary institutions. Previous to the Boxer uprising, the Methodist University and its campus covered some ten acres close to the Tartar city wall near the Hateman gate. All that remain of it to-day are a few heaps of gray bricks behind a shattered stone wall. The work of reconstruction has begun; but while it is in progress, the university is housed in an old Chinese compound, which has been made comfortable with American stoves and carpets. All that is left of the Tung Chow College of the American Board is quartered in an exceptionally attractive, compound about a mile from Legation street.

The Needle's Eye

A NEW SERIAL STORY WRITTEN EXPRESSLY

Chapter III.—Stretching Forth of his Wings

ON the following day Elizabeth Winch stood in the open door of her house, a smile of timid welcome on her face; the minister's wife was coming up the path. "Do walk right in, Mis' Holditch," she said hospitably; "it's awful cold, ain't it? You'd better take your things off, I guess, while you're settin', or you won't sense them when you go out."

The minister's wife untied her blue veil and unpinned her heavy blanket shawl. "It's cold," she admitted; "but I was well wrapped up." She was a stout, motherly woman, with a countenance composed to a comfortable acquiescence in the inscrutable ways of Providence. "I'd like to see that baby," she added, as she emerged like a substantial beetle from its encumbering crystalis.

"You—you wouldn't be wantin' him?" asked Elizabeth, hesitatingly.

"Dear, no!" said the other, with a pitying smile. "I know too well what a piece of work it is to bring up a bottle baby! But, of course, we all take an interest in the poor child."

Elizabeth drew her guest into the tiny bed-room off the kitchen. "He's asleep," she whispered, her face glowing with joyful pride. "He sleeps most all the time when he ain't eatin'. He ain't a mite of trouble. He's growin' jest like a little weed—no, I ain't a-goin' to say that neither, weeds is ugly things. He's more like a little pink flower. There now, look at him; ain't he lovely?"

Mrs. Holditch leaned over the sleeping form, a fine motherly smile dawning in her kind eyes. She touched the soft rose of the tiny cheek with a wise forefinger. "I should say he was as healthy a child as I ever saw," she said judiciously. "And I guess you know how to do for him as well as if you'd had more experience. You want to dilute his milk with boiled water, and don't feed him every time he cries."

"He ain't hardly cried sence I've had him," breathed the other, with a triumphant smile. "An' jest look at his hair, will you, a curlin' all over his blessed little head! His eyes is as black as velvet, an' he knows me a'ready; you wouldn't believe it, would you now, Mis' Holditch?"

"They're more knowing than most folks give 'em credit for," responded the minister's wife briskly. "What does Mr. Winch say about him?"

Elizabeth's face clouded. He don't want him," she said sullenly. "But I've made up my mind."

"You might name him after your husband," suggested Mrs. Holditch, elevating her eyebrows with an understanding glance.

"No, he's named a'ready. He's named 'Manuel. I named him first thing."

"Manuel!" repeated Mrs. Holditch, wonderingly. "Why, that sounds kind of a foreign and outlandish name for him, doesn't it?"

"It's in the Bible," said Elizabeth; "an' I seen it on the communion table over to Turner's Cross-roads once. 'The stretchin' out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, Oh, 'Manuel!'"

"I understand now—Immanuel. It means God with us." Mrs. Holditch glanced at the soft-heaving wrappings on the bed with a sigh. "Dear me, it's pretty hard to understand the dealings of the Lord sometimes!"

Elizabeth laid her hand on the good woman's plump arm. "'Rastus is jest a-comin' in," she whispered beseechingly. "If you could say anythin' to kind of reconcile him, I'd be terrible 'bleeged to you, Mis' Holditch."

Erastus Winch shook hands with the minister's wife, with a reluctant widening of his grim mouth. "You ain't been out to see us fur quite a spell," he began agreeably. "But of course, as I was tellin' the parson, las' Sunday, there 's them 'at pays more fur his support 'an I do; an' I s'pose they're entitled to his partic'lar 'tention."

"I believe Mr. Holditch expects to see all the members of his congregation at least twice a year," replied the lady, with becoming meekness. "He's been very busy this week with funerals."

"Yas, it's a mighty bad season; terrible onhealthy. I've been laid up most all winter with one thing or 'nother. Crops was bad, too, an' what with money scurser 'n hen's teeth, an' everythin' way up in gee, 'tain't a very good time to incur extry expenses. What do you say, Mis' Holditch?"

"It would depend a little on what the extra expense was," said Mrs. Holditch, cautiously.

"Humph!" ejaculated Winch, with a sour look at his wife, "I s'pose you've seen it."

"Do you mean the baby? Yes, I've just seen it. He's a fine child; he'll soon grow into a strong, active boy."

"He won't be wuth his keep fur ten years," growled that nohow, an' money tight as 't is now. The poor-house 'll be open fur quite a spell yet, an' one day'll do as well 's 'nother as fur 's I'm consarned."

Those systematized numerical collections of facts known as statistics, however coldly dull they may appear, are the concise expression of prolonged effort, the colorless residuum in life's seething alembic. If it be stated, for example, that Elizabeth Winch has fried some fifteen thousand slices of pork; that she has washed dishes five thousand, four hundred and seventy-five times; that she has fed the chickens and calves two thousand times more or less, upon which occasions she has been the patient recipient of some twenty-seven thousand rasping complaints from her yoke-fellow—all this since the December morning when Immanuel first opened his eyes to the light, it may be simply inferred that a period of five years has been added to the term of her earthly existence.

Fortunately for Elizabeth, as for many another, she was not accustomed to view her labors from the statistical standpoint. If she was bound to her narrow wheel of labor, she at least forbore to often look at her chain. At times her wan face seemed to reflect the rosy glow which pulsed in the round cheeks of Immanuel.

During these years the child grew in strength and beauty; the spreading of his wings had indeed come to fill the whole land for Elizabeth. That he linked the sordid seen with the celestial unseen she never doubted; the memory of the strangely beautiful face of the dead mother had remained with her in the guise of a living presence. She came to regard herself as in some wise guided and directed by this benign intelligence, known in the secret of her own heart as "his mother."

"She couldn't be contented in no heaven whilst he's here," she would say to herself. "More especial as she kin see 'at I ain't no ways experienced in the fetchin' up of childern. It says in the Bible 'at we'r all ministerin' sperits, sent forth to minister; an' that, I take it, means 'at they ain't allowed to stay inside no pearly gates a-singin' an' playin' on golden harps as long's their own folks needs lookin' after here below."

This curious sense of intimate and helpful companionship so grew upon her that she formed the habit of conversing familiarly with the imagined presence while about her work. "Ain't he growin' perfect'ly wonderful?" she would whisper, stooping to look at the child wrapped in the rosy sleep of babyhood. "Jest look after him a spell, an' keep him asleep ef you kin whilst I step out to feed them chickens."

The unseen mother was often similarly called upon to "keep him mighty still while 'Rastus is round;" and many were the fervent outpourings of gratitude when some dreaded crisis was safely past.

"What in under the sun would I ha' done ef you hadn't managed to quiet him down jest as you did?" she whispered on one occasion, when the child's loud crying had elicited a savage threat from her husband. "Seem's s'o I'd go crazy; but land! he shet right up the minute he laid his pretty eyes on you! I seen him a-lookin' at you as plain as day. I s'pose mebbe your wings—all shiny like—must ha' 'traced his 'tention!"

Erastus Winch appeared as unconscious as an animal of the heavenly change in the atmosphere of his home. He went his way after his old surly fashion, and for the most part paid no manner of attention to the child. But the time came when Elizabeth detected a speculative gleam in his dull eyes as they rested upon the boy. Winch was smoking his pipe on the back porch on a summer evening; Elizabeth sat on the steps watching Immanuel as he industriously gathered fragments of wood in a basket.

"What's he doin'?" demanded the farmer, removing his pipe and pointing Winch. "My wife here is set on keepin' him; but I don't want him. I've been thinkin' of consultin' the minister on the subjec' of a man's rulin' his own house. That's Bible, ain't it?"

"I heard Mr. Holditch say that a likely boy, that cost practically nothing to raise, was a good investment for a farmer," observed Mrs. Holditch, in a hard, practical tone. "You'd have his services till he was of age, I suppose; I should advise you to keep the child."

Mr. Winch had been engaged in cutting a liberal mouthful of plug tobacco with a clasp knife. He shook his head with a surly glance at his wife; his jaws were occupied with the fragrant weed, but they ceased to move for a full minute in the light of the look she flashed him in return: the same unalterable determination he had faced once before shone in the faded eyes.

"Wall, I dunno," he said at length. "I guess I'm a blamed fool fur bein' so soft-hearted; but jest to please you, Mis' Holditch, I reckon I'll hev to give in 'bout the boy. 'Tain't likely he'll ever be any good to me; an' Mis' Winch 'ull hev to look out 'at she don't neglect no reg'lar dooties a-waitin' on him; can't put up with

The Rev. Joseph Hamilton Believes it was the Starry Form of an Angel

THE STAR! What star? Of the countless stars that roll in space, which one is entitled to the distinction of being called The Star? We know not which star may be intrinsically the most important; but surely the star of transcendent human interest is the star that guided the wise men of the East to the place where the infant Saviour lay.

A peculiar mystery has enveloped that star since the night on which it appeared. The function it performed was so different from that of other stars, and it came into such close relation to ourselves, that it is not surprising that men through the whole Christian era have been trying to explain and account for it. It must be confessed, however, that the theories that have been put forward are singularly unfortunate. They do not reasonably account for the facts in the Gospel narrative, and a supposed miracle is usually lugged in, which only makes the narrative more incredible.

I take the Gospel record as a true statement of facts that actually occurred on the occasion of the Saviour's birth. With those who would exclude or explain away those remarkable occurrences I have no common ground in this discussion.

Now, any theory that would account reasonably for the star in question must fulfil certain conditions. First, the supposed star must have some peculiar appearance, to attract the notice of the wise men. Next, it must be a moving star. Then it must distinctly stop. Further, it must be near enough to indicate the particular house where the infant lay. Moreover, a supposed miracle must not be brought in, or at least no event more miraculous than other events transpiring at the same time.

Some extreme literalists have contended that the star in question must have been a real, ordinary star, just because it is called a star. Others, with more ingenuity, have labored to show that the star was formed by a conjunction of three stars—as if that would help the matter.

It is very plain that no ordinary star has any apparent motion; hence, it could not apparently stop; besides, it is too far away to indicate any particular spot. Others think the star was the aurora borealis; forgetting the fact that the northern light is never seen in such southern latitudes, and the further fact that the quivering character of that light would forbid its serving the purpose recorded. Others have thought that the star was a comet, which, in this case, would be as signal a failure as a fixed star or a quivering northern light. But most of our commentators suppose the star was a meteor. Evidently it could not be an ordinary meteor, even if it were close enough to answer the purpose, for a meteor never shines more than a few seconds, and it never stands still. Realising this, the meteor expounders usually imagine this meteor to have been miraculously used for the occasion.

The question is: "Is there any alternative theory which does fulfil the conditions without calling in the aid of a miracle?" I believe there is a reasonable theory that fulfils all the conditions. The theory is this: that the star in question was simply an angel. In the first place, we know (from the sacred record), that many angels were near at hand on that eventful night when Jesus was born. If an angel were wanted for this mission, a host of them hovered over Bethlehem, filling the air with their songs. It seems that the leader of that heavenly choir first spoke to the shepherds, and told them very minutely where Christ was born. Now, if we believe that an angel told certain men where Jesus was born, is it hard to believe that an angel would show certain other men the very place? If it were a question of mere credibility it would be easier for me to believe that an angel might go before and show the place without speaking, rather than that he should speak to men and tell them of the place in human language. The shepherds were in the immediate locality; so the angel gave them the minute instructions which they needed. This was enough for the shepherds. But the wise men came from afar. They did not know the locality, and needed more special guidance. So the star appeared to them while they were away in the East, and not only guided them to Jerusalem, but to Bethlehem, and then to the very house they sought. I think it not unlikely that the angel who spoke to the shepherds was the same who guided the wise men. In the one case he performed his mission by words, and in the other case by a visible sign. We may well suppose that these devout sages would not be prepared for a verbal message from an angel, but that they might readily follow the leading of a star.

This star-angel went before the wise men. He must have been near, else his motion would not have been apparent enough to be followed. It seems that he disappeared for a time on the way, and then reappeared. Not only so, but when he came to the house he stopped and remained over it as an indication that the desired place was reached. Here was voluntary motion, will, purpose, intelligence. These powers must have been exercised by some conscious agent outside the star, or they must have been inherent in the star itself. Which is the more likely? To suppose that a meteor was specially brought here, and by some supernatural power was caused to act in such an unheard-of way, involves a miracle of the kind that is hardest to believe. Yet this is the view that has usually been advanced, and I presume generally accepted. My theory, on the contrary, supposes that the star was merely the luminous presence of an active, conscious, intelligent, spiritual being, who was fulfilling his high mission of making known the birth of the Saviour.

THE MAGI LED TO THE MANGER

This final consideration is, that an angel would naturally have the appearance of a star. Taking the Bible accounts of angels, we know that they often appeared in human form. But this is certainly not their normal appearance. Ordinarily they seem to be invisible to our grosser vision. When they do appear it is usually in a form of luminous brightness. There are many scriptural allusions, direct and indirect, in support of this view. Isaiah says, "How art thou fallen from heaven, O day-star, son of the morning." (R. V.) Without staying to discuss the question as to whom these words refer—usually applied to Satan—we must note that some great personage fell from some high estate, and that in falling he is likened to a star. And in Revelation we have a singular corroboration of the same idea. "The fifth angel sounded," says John, "and I saw a star fall from heaven." But mark: in the same sentence the star becomes an angel; "to him was given the key of the bottomless pit." Notice that I am not trying to expound the Revelation; I am only pointing out that a certain star turned out to be an angel. Why, then, is the angel spoken of as a star? Simply because he appeared as a star, and in the first instance John would not know that he was anything but a star. Is it hard to believe, then, that the star of the wise men was really an angel?

THE STAR SHINES ON THE CRADLE

"Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth unseen, both when we wake and when we sleep."

The adoption of the theory I have tried to recommend gives us more vivid and realistic glimpses of the unseen. This is what the world needs to-day. He does a service to mankind who even to a small extent lifts the curtain of the unseen, and shows men that there is another world and another life than this.

Rev. C. M. Sheldon Believes it was "a Supernatural Light"

In answer to your questions concerning the Star of Bethlehem, I do not think I can be quoted as authority in the matter, as I make no pretensions to scientific or astronomical knowledge concerning the Star of Bethlehem. But from the Bible account, I have always been of the opinion that the Star of Bethlehem was a supernatural light in the heavens, as much a feature of the birth of Christ as the appearance of the angels to the shepherds. A miracle is a miracle, and one is no harder than another. The Bible account leaves me satisfied with the belief that the Star was not one of the regularly created heavenly bodies, but that it was a preternatural light, which appeared for that special occasion.

CHARLES M. SHELDON.

It was a Spiritual Revealing of the Presence of Angels

It was a heavenly light, a spiritual revealing of the presence of angels. It was first seen in the East, in the place where the wise men resided, and then was seen a second time when they left Jerusalem to go to Bethlehem. Accustomed to look for the fulfilment of Balaam's prophecy, "There shall come a star out of Jacob," they saw a light which had the form of a star, and knew that the Messiah promised to the Jews had come. They therefore went to Jerusalem, but the star-like light did not lead them, and, therefore, they asked on arrival, "Where is he that is born king of the Jews?" The needed information was obtained from the Jewish scholars, who had the prophecy of Micah, and then the wise men continued their journey to Bethlehem. They needed at this point the guidance of the light to show them the right house and child, and they had it. No star, meteor or comet could have done what this light did, in being visible in a distant country, and then visible again in a southward movement from the gate of Jerusalem to a certain house in a small town. A star or constellation might be seen to the south of Jerusalem, but it could not be said of it that "it came and stood over where the young child was." The idea that it was a material star may seem at first sight to make the miracle more plausible, but on the contrary any material explanation calls for much more unreasoning credulity than a spiritual one.

The spiritual theory of the star meets with no difficulty whatever. The Scriptures abound in such appearances of light from heaven. Abraham saw in vision what seemed like a smoking furnace and a burning lamp pass between the two parts of his offering (Gen. 15: 17); Moses saw a bush as if it were on fire (Exodus 3: 2); all Israel saw the pillar of cloud and fire (Exodus 14: 20), and it was always over the tabernacle (40: 38), the glorious cloud "filled the house of the Lord" when completed by Solomon (I. Kings 8: 10). Ezekiel saw "a great cloud and a fire infolding itself" (1: 4); Daniel saw an angel whose face was like lightning, and his eyes like lamps of fire (10: 6). Paul saw the "light from heaven" (Acts 9: 3); to Peter a "light shined in the prison" (Acts 12: 7), and especially in the Book of Revelation we read of "the face as the sun shineth in his strength" (1: 16).

In this view of it "the glory of the Lord" which the shepherds saw was a fuller revealing of the same light (Luke 2: 9), and both shepherds and wise men saw something of "the true Light, which was in the world, and the world knew him not" (John 1: 9-11).

"The kingdom of heaven is at hand," this was the announcement of the Baptist in the wilderness (Matthew the little stable made from the cave in the hillside, where, in that night of nights, a child found his cradle in a manger, who was of so much importance that men ceased to count by the "Year of Rome," and began to count by "The Year of Our Lord."

Matthew has told us of the coming of the delegation of the wise men of the East. He does not tell us from whence they came, nor how many there were of them. Tradition tells us that there were three of them, but there is nothing in the inspired story to suggest that number, unless it be that three gifts are mentioned, and the inference has been drawn that each one of the wise men made the one gift. The eloquent Chrysostom believed with Saint Augustine that there were twelve of these wise men, but the well-nigh universal acceptance among Christian people is that there were three. Tradition has given us even the names and personal characteristics of these lofty seekers. We are told that Melchior was an old man, having a patriarchal appearance, from his white hair and his long snowy beard. A second, Caspar, was a ruddy and beardless youth, with all the glow and fire of his young manhood in his veins. The third, Balthasar, was in the high-noon of life, a man at his middle-aged best, and of a swarthy appearance. According to this tradition, which is perhaps the most widely spread of all, these wise men are made to represent different portions of the world and different periods of human life. The traveler in Cologne is shown three skulls when he visits the cathedral, which are said to be the skulls of these three kings. Each skull is circled with a crown of jeweled gold.

The idea is very general that they were kings, and came from the far East, because of certain prophecies which seemed to point that way. The writer of the seventy-second psalm says: "The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall give presents; the kings of Arabia and Saba shall bring gifts." And Isaiah, in his prophetic anthem, exultingly exclaims: "And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising."

Many noted students, and among them Kepler, the famous astronomer, have believed that the star spoken of in the sacred narrative was an unknown star which made its appearance in the Oriental heavens, because of a conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter and Mars at about that time. It is certain that there was such a conjunction in the year 1604, which was followed by a temporary star, and the scientific inference is that the same star appeared at the former conjunction, which occurred at about the time of the birth of Jesus.

There is, of course, no positive evidence as to what the star was which Matthew describes. Some think it was a comet or some other similar body. Others are of the opinion that it was a meteor, resembling more or less a shooting star, which trailed slowly along at a little distance from the ground, so as to guide the wise men. Undoubtedly the language used by Matthew favors the theory that it was a miraculous illumination, as much so as the vision of angels which appeared to the shepherds. This is very clearly suggested in the words of the Scripture story, "And lo, the star, which they saw in the East, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was." If it had been an ordinary star in the heavens, it could not have acted in that way, for it would have appeared just as far away from them in Bethlehem, as in the desert, or in their own far-away East.

There is another pretty picture in the story, after they have turned their backs on the city of Jerusalem, and have started toward the little town of Bethlehem, when the star, temporarily lost, again appears to them, Matthew says, "When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy." They turned aside no more, but followed the heaven-given guide until it stood above the lowly building, wherein Mary and Joseph watched over the precious treasure that had been committed to them. With the star standing overhead, they entered the house, and are convinced that here is the King they have been seeking, and they bow down low before the Star Child and worship him. They go back to their camels, and, opening their treasures, they bring forth their gold, and frankincense, and myrrh, and lay them at the feet of the little babe.

Cunningham Gekie says that when he stood in the Chapel of the Nativity, which now marks the hallowed

The Star Child and the Miraculous Sign

REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS

IN the year of Rome 747 and in the month of December the world was full of expectancy. There was a general feeling among the nations that some great event was going to happen. It was also rumored among the nations that this great occurrence would appear among the Jews.

That which was filling the greater world with a vague restlessness and excitement, was very real and tangible to a few individuals in a narrower circle. The angel had appeared to Mary, the beautiful virgin, and had revealed the mystery, the honor, and the glory that was to be hers. Joseph, the pure-hearted carpenter, had been pondering for months the solemn and august message that had come to him, and now the tax-gatherer's writ, which cannot be evaded, has come, and though it is winter, and the frail and delicate girl wife ill-fitted for the journey, the carpenter-shop in Nazareth is closed, and the trying trip to Bethlehem undertaken. It is not our purpose in this story to follow them on their journey to the town made forever immortal by the birth of Jesus; to watch them as they stand before the closed doors of the crowded inn; to follow them into spot where Christ was born, he saw in the centre of the floor a silver star, marking the place, it is believed, over which the Star of the East once rested, with an inscription, "Here Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary," he wept like a child, and though an armed Turkish soldier stood behind him, he forgot all about him, and, falling on his knees, he pressed his lips to that silver star, and wet it with his tears. Surely it is in the same spirit we must meet every Christmas day. Christ is the Star of our hope and our love and with eyes blinded with tears, we press onward in the light of his radiance. The Star shall not stand still for us till we see the King in his glory.

A Grain of Sand

BY CARL VON DEHRMANN

DOST deem this sphere on which we ride
For man alone God did provide
And that he wrought for none beside?

Man thinks earth is of wondrous size;
For man alone through space it flies;
To God it may seem otherwise.

Consider well earth's countless host
Of other tenants ere you boast
That God for puny man cares most.

When next you walk the ocean strand,
Take up a single grain of sand
And place upon your open hand.

All things on this terraqueous ball
That walk or fly or swim or crawl,
These are God's tenants, one and all.

Consider then the coast line vast,
Where, in the aeons of the past
Great heaps of sand were upward cast.

How does this tiny grain compare
With all the grains thus gathered there?
Compute the number if you dare.

Millions on millions, each a sun;
Round each in ordered courses run
Planets and moons, full many a one.

Nor deem you that creative might
Has ceased, because the lessening light
No longer serves your feeble sight.

Look out upon the starry night;
Observe the myriad points of light,
Each one a sun, than ours more bright.

But, reaching vision's outmost pale,
Where mightiest glasses sadly fail,
The camera takes up the tale.

Think not the myriad worlds you see
All of creation that can be—
'Tis but a nook is shown to thee.

And if you would still further go,
And more of God's creation know,
The telescope will help to show

And further on creation's way
Permits the mind of man to stray,
Evolving shadows dim and gray.

Thus, in Jehovah's open hand
This wondrous earth of sea and land
May seem to him a grain of sand.

Safe Home From the Deep Sea

THESE peasant folk, who live by the toil of the sea, and find its waters kind in that they yield them bread, have many an anxious hour, but they are simple hearted and loyal, and there is great joy in a Breton cottage when the fisherman comes home from a cruise. Last night was stormy and the waves boomed as they thundered and broke on the coast, white-capped, angry, furious in the wild gale. The little one slept in his trundle bed; rosy and sweet, he awoke this morning to be picked up by his mother and carried to the boat landing to greet his father. Wife and child and dear old mother, grandmere, so well beloved all, are always ready to welcome home the manly fellow who does so much to keep alive the fire on the cottage hearth.

A thought occurs of the way that the wide world around, men toil and strive for their families, happy and fully repaid by the devotion they win at home. Sometimes there is a tempest on the sea, and the brave sailor never gets back.

Three fishers went sailing away to the west,
Away to the west as the sun went down,
Each thought of the woman who loved him the best,

And the children stood watching them out of the town,
For men must work and women must weep,
And there's little to earn, and many to keep,
Though the harbor bar be moaning.

Yes, men must work, but women need not always weep. Joy cometh often and brightly, in the morning. The laden creel, where the shining fish speak of a successful catch, means a great deal to the women who rear the fisherman's sturdy boys and girls. And the man himself, holding the little lad in his strong arms, tastes the honey of life.

THE LONG WHITE SEAM.

As I came round the harbor bay,
The lights began to gleam,
No wave the land-locked water stirred;
The crags were white as cream;
And I marked my love by candle-light
Sewing her long white seam.

I climbed to reach her cottage door,
O sweetly my love sings!
Like a shaft of light her voice breaks forth,
My soul to meet it springs!
As the shining water leaped of old
When stirred by angel wings.
Aye, longing to list anew,
Awake and in my dream,
But never a song she sang like this,
Sewing her long white seam.

Fair fall the lights, the harbor lights
That brought me in to thee;
And peace drop down on that low roof
For the sight that I did see.
And the voice, my dear, that rang so clear
All for the love of me.
For O, for O, with brows bent low
By the candle's flickering gleam,
Her wedding gown, it was she wrought
Sewing the long white seam.

The Passing of the Kiss

A kiss is the most intimate token of love. The mother's kiss is the holiest thing on earth. The kiss of betrothal is sacred. The good-night and the good-morning kiss in the home are beautiful evidences of regard and affection, and should never be omitted between parents and children, brothers and sisters. Promiscuous kissing is an offense against good manners, and may be a menace to health. Invalids should be very lovingly tended, but not kissed. Kisses disturb them, do no good, and may convey contagion. The Princess Alice of Hesse, Queen Victoria's most gifted daughter, lost her life from diphtheria, contracted by kissing her dying child. Wise mothers do not let everybody kiss their dimpled darlings, and many little tots are taught either to offer the cheek, or the tiny hand for an admirer's kiss, and are enjoined not to put up the roseate lips.

Twenty years ago, or thereabouts, two women friends meeting in a shop, or on the promenade, almost invariably saluted one another with a kiss. Sometimes it was perfunctory, sometimes fervid, but it was customary and not occasional. Feminine acquaintances encountering people only slightly known, in the house of a common friend, flew into each other's arms with chirp and rustle and peck.

Nobody was very greatly surprised, however, but when it was made the theme of criticism everybody perceived its absurdity, and little by little, the kiss retreated from the streets and avenues, from afternoon calls, and morning committee meetings, from society and publicity, into the guarded sanctuary of the home, where of right it belongs. Women no longer kiss in public. A cordial hand-shake sufficiently expresses one's pleasure and interprets one's good wishes, at a casual meeting.

Men of the Anglo-Saxon race have never been wont to kiss one another, save on rare and eventful occasions, but the Latin peoples are more enthusiastic and demonstrative and do not seem to mind osculation before folk. They, too, soon feel the chilling influence of present-day conventions here in America, and with us, will soon wave good-by to the kiss, meeting and parting with some less noticeable pledge of love.

RETURNING FROM THE FISHING CRUISE

The President's Children

The White House is again gay with children's voices, and Ethel, the pretty ten-year-old daughter, is up before seven, that she may set out for her day-school, to and from which she drives in the regular school omnibus that calls for her, as for the other pupils. Kermit trudges manfully off on foot to his school. President and Mrs. Roosevelt, being eminently sensible people, are bringing up their sturdy brood of boys and girls in republican simplicity.

When Christmas Comes

CHRISTMAS is almost here, friends. May I say one word about Sunday School anniversary observances? For every reason it would seem that the hallowed character of Christmas should be emphasized on Christmas Eve, if practicable, in a purely religious service, with hymns, Scripture reading, and the impressing on childish minds of the scenes that were so beautiful at the Saviour's birth, the Star in the East, the coming of the Magi, the homage of the shepherds, the song of the angels, and the Infant Jesus should be worshiped anew as he lies in the manger. Then, on some week night of the holidays, have the Santa Claus and the Christmas Tree, and the gifts and fun and frolic, if you wish. What I mean is this: keep the secular and the sacred observances of Christmas separate, and, when you gather for the Sunday School or the church festival per se, let there be no letting down, but uphold in youthful minds the ideal of the Babe of Bethlehem, born of a human mother, who, in the fullness of time, came to save his people from their sins.

The very general forgetfulness of our children as to the real meaning of Christ's birthday, is not their fault, but ours. I love dear old Santa Claus, but his is the secondary place. The religious observances should take precedence over all others at Christmas-tide.

The First Grandchild

Is there an elixir so sweet as that pressed drop by drop into the cup the grandmother holds, when, unspeakably proud, supremely thankful, she exhibits to her friends her first grandchild? She was utterly happy in the long ago, at the birth of her own first babe, but this later gladness has something even more divine, for God has spared her to see the coming of the second generation. The love grandmother lavishes on the baby, who is doubly hers, because her son's or her daughter's, is oddly compounded of two other affections; the child claims its own love and its parent's love, too. All the new grandmothers of the season know that this is true.

AUNT PRUDENCE PAYSON'S CATCH-ALL

—DAISY. I beg you will not show anxiety for attentions from the other sex.

—IMOGENE. Well, I would not write to that young man. He apparently was amusing himself with you. Let him write first.

—FANNY. Wool is disagreeable to some sensitive skins. Put thin cotton stockings on the child under the warmer woolen ones.

—JOHN. You are too conceited. I do not believe the young lady has noticed your failure to call, which is, however, rather rude.

—CONCORDIA. Follow the pronunciation of those about you. The obvious way is to look at the spelling of the name you mention and use your ear.

—ELEANOR R. Make your mother-in-law very welcome in your home, and treat her with the greatest consideration, even if you think her rather trying.

—A CONSTANT READER. The lady bows first. A man cannot bow on the street to a woman whom he does not know. Such conduct is insulting as well as vulgar.

—MARGARET. You are in a difficult position, but your most dignified course is to ignore the silly girl who has so little sense of propriety; everybody concerned would best treat her with indifference.

—LITTLE PANSY. Rub a little vaseline into the roots of your hair two or three times a week. Brush your hair night and morning with fifty long, even strokes of the brush. Wash it once a month, a little ammonia in the water.

—OCTOGENARIAN. Whether or not the boiling a silver spoon in the pot with mushrooms is a sure test to tell the poisonous from the wholesome, I am not sure. You say that if poisonous, the spoon will turn black. There are simple ways of determining the difference between mushrooms and toadstools, and they are given in every botanical work. Children should let them alone, I think.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Fighting at Colon

NEW spheres of military activity on the part of our Government directed public attention last week to a conflict, the merits of which are but little understood. The result of our interference in it was a situation hitherto unprecedented in warfare. It arose out of a threat to bombard Colon, an Atlantic port in the Republic of Colombia. Colon is the terminus of a railroad which crosses the Isthmus of Panama. Our Government some years ago, gave a pledge that in the event of the Republic of Colombia being unable to protect the railroad, the United States would do so. That contingency has arisen, through a revolution which has broken out in Colombia. The insurgents gained possession of Colon, and the Government forces resolved to drive them out. Thereupon the United States troops, in fulfillment of the pledge, were landed and took control of the railroad. The curious feature of this action was that whenever a train passed through Colon, the army of the Colombian Government and that of the insurgents were forced to cease fighting until the train had reached a distance in which it was safe from stray bullets. So much respect did both parties show to the authority of the United States, that no matter how fierce the fighting was, it was suspended when train time came. The conflict itself is part of the antagonism between parties which prevails in all the Central American States. The Conservatives, on the one hand, are bent on maintaining the old traditions of Spanish rule, while the Liberals desire such civil and religious liberty and such a system of government as we have in the United States. The Conservatives have had control of the Government since, in 1886, Nunez gained the upper hand and made himself dictator. Two years ago, the Liberals, resenting the influence of the Church, demanded public schools free from clerical control and a wide extension of the suffrage. Being unable to carry their demands, they broke out in open rebellion, and after severe fighting captured Colon, which, however, they have had to surrender. Probably our force there might have been beaten by either party, as it is necessarily small, but neither of them would be employees tried to feed it, but the two heads fought so hard for the food that neither mouth got much, if anything. No sooner did one head approach the food than the other attacked it viciously and it was forced to defend itself. Both heads were equally pugnacious. The curator is afraid the snake will die of starvation, although he is going to try to feed both heads at once by force. Mr. Ditmars says the snake will be one of the most valuable in the world if it does not die. It cannot live, however, if the two heads maintain their enmity to one another. It is extraordinary that even a creature of so low mental endowment as a snake, has not made the discovery that conflict between the two parts of its own nature is disastrous to the whole. But we have not much superiority of conduct to boast of. The Church of Christ has frequently by its denominational quarrels shown a similar suicidal spirit, and it existed even in Apostolic days, calling forth Paul's reproof:

Whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it (I. Cor. 12:26).

Close of a Double Life

A press dispatch from Cleveland, O., reports the death of an extraordinary woman who was well-known in that city. She was married and had a quiet, respectable home. Her many friends knew her as a very intelligent lady of literary tastes, retiring and modest in manner, always dressed very plainly in black, refined in style and conversation, and taking a lively interest in charitable work, to which she made liberal contributions. Living in Cleveland, at the same time, was a woman of remarkable beauty who was never seen until near midnight. She was gorgeously attired in showy and expensive dresses and wore jewels valued at a fabulous sum. She presided over a disorderly house in the suburbs which was frequented by vicious persons of both sexes. There she ruled as an autocrat, and her genius and gaiety and disregard for the decencies and morality of life made her famous among the most profligate class of the community. Suddenly the lady in the quiet house died, and at the same time the presiding genius of the house in the suburbs disappeared. It was then discovered that they were one and the same person, though while she lived, it had never been suspected. By day she had been staid and respectable, and by night a queen among sinners. She began the double career early in life and continued it until her death, at the age of fifty-seven. It is marvelous that her identity should not have been detected, but now the world knows how she was deceiving it. Scarcely has so bold an imposition been so successfully practised;

but the end came at last when she must learn what the prophet meant by his warning:

Woe unto them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord, and their works are in the dark, and they say, "Who seeth us? and Who knoweth us?" (Isa. 29:15).

Rioting in Athens

The Greek Capital has been for some days the scene of riotous disturbances incited by students in the national university. They doubtless have a political motive, and are part of the Slav propaganda, but their ostensible cause is a proposal to translate the New Testament into modern Greek. During the recent war with Turkey, the Queen of Greece took a deep interest in the welfare of the Greek troops, and distributed New Testaments to the soldiers. Complaints speedily reached her that many of the soldiers could not understand the books, as they were in ancient Greek. She accordingly initiated a movement for their translation into modern Greek. Immediately the students in the university entered a protest, declaring that modern Greek was no better than a patois, and that it was a desecration to publish in it the sacred Book. In combination with reckless men abounding in the city, and with disaffected politicians who were ready to take up any cause of complaint against the government, they assaulted the royal palace and the Parliament Buildings and the residence of the Premier. Regiments of cavalry were sent to disperse them, and a fight ensued, in which both parties suffered severely. It seems to us at this distance a pitiful and bigoted cause for riot and bloodshed. It appears, if the cause were really opposition to the proposal to give the people the Gospel in their own tongue, as if Greek character had not greatly changed since Paul, preaching in their city, said:

Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious (Acts 17:22).

Dr. L. W. Munhall's campaign at Dallas, Texas, has been wonderfully blessed. Twenty churches united in the movement. At the services for men only, more than one thousand asked for prayer, and it is believed that a large proportion of them have accepted Christ.

The Allgemeine Zeitung, of Munich, a recognized statistical authority, publishes the estimate that in Europe there are 384,500,000 Christians; 6,000,000 Mohammedans; and 6,500,000 Jews. It remarks on the fact that Protestants are increasing much more rapidly than Roman Catholics.

Dr. Joseph Parker of London, has just erected at a cost of $6,500, a home for girls at Sunderland, as a memorial of his late wife. She took a deep interest in the welfare of the girls of that town, which was her birthplace, and Dr. Parker felt that in no better way than this could he honor her memory.

An Extraordinary Freak

An employee in the New York Zoological Park in The Bronx, found in the park a few days ago a snake which Curator Ditmars declares is the rarest specimen in the snake line in existence. The snake is of the common milksnake variety, but has two perfectly developed heads, which are about two or three inches long. The snake shed its skin a day after it was found. Then the

A STORY BY ROUMANIA'S QUEEN

"THE REIGN OF SILENCE," A BEAUTIFUL ALLEGORY BY CARMEN SYLVA*

SILENCE passed through the forest. It was high noon, and all things slumbered. The birds dozed on the branches, the trees had ceased rustling, the bees were taking a midday nap, the wood-cutters and charcoal-burners had flung themselves down to rest, and the deer lay close in the thicket waiting till the burning heat of the sun should be over. Only the ants went on working noiselessly and industriously as ever; they did not feel the heat, and they required no rest. And Silence continued her way through the forest. She is as straight and tall as a young birch tree, and very fair, and moves along swiftly, yet with a sweetly serious mien, and the touch of her hand is none the less cool for all the scorching rays of the midsummer sun. She passed along under the tall trees, and the least little movement in their branches died away. For everything felt the power of Silence, though she came so seldom they did not always recognize her at once. Her hair was as golden as the sunbeams, her white garments flashed like the sparkling waters of some rippling stream, her eyes had the deep blue of a lake that lies hidden among the mountains, and her lovely lips were often parted in a smile, never in speech. She will not speak, because she knows how little regard men pay to Truth. Some are too lazy even to look for Truth, some too careless to understand it, others will not accept it if it condemns their own revengeful thoughts, others again stifle Truth in their calumnies. So Silence passed on smiling, and thought within herself: "I go my own way quietly and injure none. Alas, that so much harm is wrought by idle words!"

The Friendship of Silence and Truth

Silence usually dwells with Truth in her palace that is built of rock crystal, and has hundreds of tubes and speaking-trumpets placed in its walls, so that Truth may always know all that is going on all over the world. She only closes these when she is very tired of listening so much, and then she rests herself with looking out at the stars, or over the glaciers whose snowy purity is so like her own. But nothing rests and refreshes Truth so much as to have Silence come and sit with her, after the fatigue of all she has been obliged to hear. People sometimes think Silence knows very little, and that she does not speak because she has nothing to say, but that is their mistake. She knows more than others, since she is always listening, and loses no time in talk.

The forest in its noontide stillness is all her own, and there in its very midst stands the glorious ruin of an ancient church, which has become her temple, where she loves to linger. She sits there and dreams for hours of bygone things, and of the things that shall be. No sound disturbs her, no voice breaks in upon her meditation as she waits and watches for the time to be accomplished when Falsehood shall be driven from the world. Falsehood is her great enemy. Being noisy and talkative, the presence of Silence makes her feel ashamed. And Truth begins to have almost as great a horror of human speech as Silence has herself. They know how language is twisted from its meaning and perverted from the service of truth, and made to lend itself to Slander, and to serve as a mask for Error and Fraud. But Truth and Silence understand each other without speaking; they just look into each other's eyes, and then Truth knows all, while not a word is said. Falsehood, with her smooth tongue, steals away men's hearts, so that there is sometimes barely room left anywhere for Truth and Silence. And Falsehood is clothed in costly raiment and hung with jewels, to hide the rags and tatters underneath. If people did but guess the hideous squalor which that gorgeous attire conceals they would fly from her in horror, but with her smooth tongue and her finery she deceives them still, until she has them safely in her toils.

Madam Falsehood's Wiles

It happened one day that Truth had heard how Madam Falsehood seemed to be more busy in the world than ever, and she begged her friend Silence to go out and see how matters really stood. But Silence shrank back in horror from the stir and bustle of the crowded streets, and sought the refuge of her beloved woods. Resting there on a low, ruined wall of the old church, she gazed with her deep, unfathomable eyes into the solitude. All at once the sound of chattering voices broke in on her thoughts, and she fled in disgust deeper into the forest. But the noisy babble reached her there, and she could see that it was her old enemy, Falsehood, leading a little throng of children to the very temple of Silence, and teaching them to speak untruths within those sacred precincts. There sat Madam Falsehood, decked out in all her borrowed gewgaws, telling the little ones that none but fools would dream of speaking the truth; all her life she had never done so, and they might see for themselves how well she had thrived. Silence stepped forward noiselessly, and stood before the blasphemer, looking hard at her, and in one moment, in that terrible, accusing glance, the wretched Falsehood saw all the evil she had ever done pass before her. Nor was she alone in seeing it; the children, also, read the whole truth, and saw the snares she had set for them, and the pitfalls beneath their feet. They knew now that if they continued in her path, soon none would trust them, and that they could not even trust themselves. And all the while there passed before their eyes the long procession of those whom falsehood had beguiled and had made miserable with her wiles. They told their wrongs, and cursed her for her treachery, persuading them all would go well if they but did her bidding. And she herself writhed and turned livid, as her victims rose and passed before her, an endless train, against the broken wall. And Silence stood and pointed to the spot with pitiless finger, when suddenly and noiselessly the old church began to rise once more from out its ruined foundations, fairer and nobler and more spacious than ever it had been in bygone days. Its roof was the great vault of heaven itself; the forest trees were the columns that supported it; the floor was of crystal, and the walls were red as autumn leaves, and so transparent they shone like rubies, and were reflected in the crystal floor. And all the time there was never a sound, while the unseen hands went on building, so that the children's hearts stood still for awe, and their eyes were rooted to the spot where Falsehood groveled on the floor, writhing and wringing her hands, imploring Silence to have mercy on her and cease to put her to shame. At last she arose, disheveled and ghastly, and stole out of the temple and down the path that Silence pointed out, and the children, looking on tremblingly, wondered that they could ever have yielded to the blandishments of this foul hag, who gnashed her teeth with impotent rage, and whose gay attire had changed to sordid rags.

Within the Temple

When she had gone they breathed more freely, and were able to lift up their eyes and hearts and drink in the marvels that had sprung up around them. They still stood gazing within the temple of Silence, and its unearthly beauty sank into their souls. They felt, also, how her searching glance read all their inmost thoughts; a veil was torn away, and each one knew how often he had been careless, lazy, selfish, mischievous; and all resolved to strive toward better things, and become less unworthy to enter these sacred walls.

While they thought this, it seemed to them the glance of Silence grew kinder and gentler, until all that was reproachful had passed out of it, so that at last it rested on them as an unspoken benediction. And the glorious sunlight streamed through the transparent walls on to the crystal floor, the lofty tree columns seemed to touch the sky with their waving tops, and with lingering steps the children down dreamily into the depths, below, or out towards the dark, distant shore. The waters were so tranquil that a swa that had just then come swimming up to the boat seemed a most to disturb their calm; but Silence flung her arms around the lovely bird, and others came along too, and she stroked and caressed them, for they are her favorites, and they understand her, while the cackling ducks and geese are odious to her.

Suddenly her hair was gently pulled, and leaning over the boat's side, Silence beheld a crowd of nymphs and water sprites, who smiled and beckoned to her, for they thought she was like themselves, this fair and gentle being, who never spoke, and had no chattering companions to spoil the quiet of their beautiful lake. They, too, always move quietly, and when they sing on moonlight nights their voices are no louder than the breeze that stirs the treetops. So they came around the boat and smiled at Silence, and made signs to her to join them, and she smiled back at them and let her glide gently as a sleeping child down through their arms to the bottom of the lake.

Deeper and ever deeper they sank to unfathomable depths, where they had to make their way through the tangled masses of luxuriant water-plants, of shapes more varied, and richer colors than any we see on land. For above, the daylight streaming through the water, as through a crystal dome, shed a subdued golden radiance over all these marvels, as the fair water-maidens glided on, surrounding their new sister. From all sides others came to meet and welcome her, and drawn on in their midst she came to where lofty palace rose in the middle of the lake. Its towers were so high they seemed to touch the clouds, but so great was the depth they did not even reach half-way to the surface of the lake. It seemed as if the walls were formed of the wave themselves, for they were clear as crystal, and a low, rippling sound was always heard in them—the dripping of the cold green glacier stream, which flowed right through the lake and gave the palace the appearance of being built of glacier ice.

The Palace of Purity

As Silence crossed the threshold, her companions watched her curiously to see the impression made on her by the sight so new and strange; and certainly she wondered greatly what might dwell within the dazzling ice palace, and what hanc could have collected all the treasures she saw there. But she is not like little children, who if they want to know a thin must always ask at once; for what purpose were her eyes and ears, she thought, if not to learn by. So she waited patiently till all things should unfold their meaning to her. She might well be amazed as she looked around. Innumerable lamps, each formed of a single shell, were suspended by long chains of pearls from a height incalculable; the seemed like huge opals, lighted up by a flame within, and the soft, subdued light was thrown by the massive ice candelabra on all sides. Great mother-of-pearl shells, so smooth rounded they seemed made for resting in, served as seat and couches. They wandered on through countless halls, each new one more spacious and more richly decorated than the last, and everywhere shone the same pale green light and the drops from the ice blocks continued gently splashing. All at once a big wave rolled back from before a doorway, and on a couch of mother-of-pearl—herself still whiter—Purity, the queen of all these realms, reclined. Silence stood a moment awe-struck, half abashed, and bent her knee, but the other stretched her arms out in welcome, and the two fair creatures held one another in a close embrace. Ofte had Silence wondered to herself where Purity might dwell, and had sought her in her wanderings upon earth, but all she had ever dreamed of was surpassed by this meeting. She thought so little of herself, it seemed to her she was quite unworthy to stand in the presence of this radiant being; and now with out a word they understood each other.

But meanwhile Silence had been missed on earth. With out her, things had gone from bad to worse there, and Truth could hardly hold her down in the fierce struggle against False-crossed the threshold, and wandered slowly down the path that led back to their homes.

To their surprise, they found that more than a year had passed since they left. They thought it was that very morning Falsehood had lured them to follow her, but they knew now that she had purposely led them astray, so that they could never have found the way back again had not Silence sought them out and rescued them. Their parents, who had mourned them as lost, were overjoyed to welcome them, and the children comforted their parents still more by telling them how well the time had been spent; they had not wasted it, but had learned lessons that would be profitable to them all their lives. And they spoke truly, and showed that they had been in the school of Silence.

From that time, one never heard from them cross words, sharp answers, unkind mockery, or backbiting; and many who had not been happy formerly, and had thought themselves ill-treated, found that the quiet strength that now was in them enabled them to overcome their troubles easily. Sometimes they began to wonder in what the power of Silence consists. They recalled how she had looked at them, and had not threatened them, nor punished, nor even scolded, but they had seen and knew how much stronger she was than noisy speech. Now and then they tried to find the way back to her wondrous temple in the woods, but though they always thought they knew the place, the building had vanished. So the whole forest became to them the house of Silence, her sanctuary.

A Strange Voyage

Meanwhile Silence herself lay stretched out in a boat, that bore her across the waters of a deep mountain lake. Her long golden tresses floated behind her, raising tiny ripples as she let herself drift onward with the current, as she gazed

Explanatory

THIS EDITION of the Holy Scriptures is the Authorized Version, Self-pronouncing and unchanged save for the variation of color in the type. Two colors (red and black) are employed, in accordance with the following simple plan devised by Dr. Louis Klopsch:

- 1 In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of our Lord and Saviour are printed in red.
- 2 In the Old Testament, the passages printed in red are those quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which He referred.
- 3 Red lettering in the Reference Column of the Old Testament directs the reader to some particular utterance of Christ, in which the corresponding quotation or allusion may be found.
- 4 A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that, in the concurrent opinion of scholars and theologians, the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ.

No Other Bible

LIKE UNTO THIS!

Here the actual words, quotations, references and allusions of Christ, not separated from their context, nor in a fragmentary or disconnected form, but in their own proper place, as an integral part of the Sacred Record, stand out vividly conspicuous in the distinction of color. The plan also possesses the advantage of showing how frequently and how extensively, on the authority of Christ himself, the authenticity of the Old Testament is confirmed, thus greatly facilitating comparison and verification, and enabling the student to trace the connection between the Old and the New, link by link, passage by passage.

Isaiah 55

he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the LORD shall prosper in his hand.

11 He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied: by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities.

12 Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death: and he was numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors.

Chapter 54

1 The prophet, for the comfort of the Gentiles, prophesieth the amplitude of their church, 6 their certain deliverance out of affliction, 15 and their sure preservation.

SING, O barren, thou that didst not bear; break forth into singing, and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child: for more are the children of the desolate than the children of the married wife, saith the LORD.

2 Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations: spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes;

3 For thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left; and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited.

4 Fear not; for thou shalt not be ashamed: neither be thou confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame: for thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more.

5 For thy Maker is thine husband; the LORD of hosts is his name; and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel; The God of the whole earth shall he be called.

6 For the LORD hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, and a wife of youth, when thou wast refused, saith thy God.

7 For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee.

8 In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with Israel assured of God's unchanging love everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the LORD thy Redeemer.

9 For this is as the waters of No'ah unto me: for as I have sworn that the waters of No'ah should no more go over the earth; so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee.

10 For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the LORD that hath mercy on thee.

11 O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay thy foundations with sapphires.

12 And I will make thy window of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones.

13 And all thy children shall be taught of the LORD; and great shall be the peace of thy children.

14 In righteousness shalt thou be established: thou shalt be far from oppression; for thou shalt not fear: and from terror; for it shall not come near thee.

15 Behold, they shall surely gather together, but not by me: whosoever shall gather together against thee shall fall for thy sake.

16 Behold, I have created the smith that bloweth the coals in the fire, and that bringeth forth an instrument for his work; and I have created the waster to destroy.

17 No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the LORD, and their righteousness is of me, saith the LORD.

Chapter 55

1 The prophet, with the promises of Christ, calleth to faith, 6 and to repentance. 8 The happy success of them that believe.

HO, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price.

It sheds a new radiance upon the sacred pages, by which the reader is enabled to trace unerringly the scarlet thread of prophecy from Genesis to Malachi. Like the Star which led the Magi to Bethlehem, this light, shining through the entire Word, leads straight to the person of the Divine Messiah, as the fulfilment of the promise of all the ages.

A MOTHER'S PRAYERS

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE little room to which Mrs. Leicester retired every morning for an hour, always wore an air of mystery and awe in the eyes of her children. It was almost as bare as the cell of a nun, containing no furniture beyond a table and a chair, while on the wall hung a single engraving, a picture of our Lord in the agony of Gethsemane. Mrs. Leicester loved pictures of the Saviour, and in other rooms there were rare Madonnas, and beautiful scenes from his blessed life on earth; but in her little prayer-room there was only this one picture. A Bible, read over and over, and with many a tear-blotted page, lay upon the table, and when mother went into her closet and shut the door, Howard, Arthur, and Geraldine knew that she was reading and praying, that she was communing with her Unseen Friend. They never disturbed her then, and, as they grew out of childhood, it did not escape their watchful observation that, however sorrowful the mother's face might be when she went into her little retreat, when she came out, it always shone as with a light from heaven. In her darkest days, her face was serene when she emerged from her watch alone with Jesus, for he gave her an assurance of his presence, and the most perfect peace.

The children did not wholly realize in their early days how sad was their mother's life. They saw in their father, a genial, indulgent, boyish comrade, who was never harsh nor fretful. Sometimes, at intervals of several weeks, there were periods when they did not see him at all. They were sent away on visits, or the mother so contrived that if they were in the house, they were kept out of sight and hearing of their father. They did not dream of the transformation into a demon which took place when Ralph Leicester was in one of his increasingly frequent debauches; when his temper became fiendish, his words blasphemous, and, for the time, he was a furious wretch, with whom it was dangerous to live. Drink simply maddened this man, and made him a maniac. Many a bruise on the wife's arms, many a blow, many an outburst of violent anger, God saw and knew, but only one faithful servant in the house ever did more than suspect the story of Emily Leicester's daily martyrdom.

Through it all, she went in faith, a faith that never wavered, though her heart was breaking, to her little room, and kneeling there, committed her husband to the great love and mercy of God.

At last the strain was ended. One stormy night, as Ralph was coming home late from a carouse, his horse stumbled and threw him to the ground. The horse found his way home, riderless; the man, insensible, hours afterward was carried into the home he had profaned by his excesses. He did not die at once, there were a few days of weakness and suffering; but death came, and before it, repentance.

"There is life for a look at the crucified One," and Ralph Leicester found pardon at the eleventh hour. And when he was gone, his wife, though she grieved for the lover of her youth, entered upon a season of most restful tranquillity.

She brought her children up in the strictest abstinence. Not a drop of any intoxicant was suffered in her house, for any reason. Ever there was an unspoken dread in her soul, that some one of her flock might have inherited the weakness of their father.

Geraldine was twenty, a most beautiful girl, when she lay stricken with typhoid fever. As she came back, after a long illness, from the shores of the black river, the doctor ordered her stimulants.

"Doctor Page," said the mother, "I would rather see my child die than expose her to this peril."

"There is no peril," said the physician deliberately. "She will take the wine as thorough, as they went to college and to business, followed in her footsteps. Not a single child of Ralph Leicester escaped the taint. Gifted, graceful, debonair, charming,—each was handicapped by an irresolute will; each was unable to say no; each plunged a dagger in the mother's heart, as she saw the wreck of her hopes, and witnessed the degradation of her children.

But she never ceased to pray for them. Day by day, not once now, but often, she went to her oratory, and wrestled with God for her dear ones. He is faithful that promised her exceeding comfort, for comforted she was, else she could not have borne her burdens. Geraldine lost caste in society. People did not want in their houses a young woman who neath the pictured face of her Master in his agony, the mother prayed.

There came a beautiful Christmas morning, such a day of dazzling whiteness and splendor as God sometimes gives the world when every tower, and roof, and fence, and tree is a coruscation of light. But in the Leicester home there was no mirth, for in her own chamber, the faithful mother lay dying. The presents she had bought for her children were labelled, the happy festal preparations were completed, and she had been in her usual health, until two days before Christmas, when pneumonia stole in upon her, like a thief in the night, and she had no strength left for resistance.

"In such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

On the wan countenance of the dying woman, an ineffable brightness glowed. She seemed to be listening, and perhaps she heard the sweet echoes of the angels who ever come on Christmas morn, "with peaceful wings unfurled." She looked unutterably happy and reposeful, to the marvel of those who stood beside her, counting the fainting heart-beats. The children were there, all of them, not one of them quite sober. I was a pitiful sight, but the mother did not seem to mind. She had sailed out into a calm sea, and the reefs near shore vexed her no longer. Her Pilot was at the helm. No sorrow in this crossing of the bar.

"Emily! Emily!" cried a friend, who had been as a sister since her girlhood. "Emily, do you still trust God? Does God answer prayer?"

She raised herself with a sudden and amazing strength. "He is faithful that promised!" she said in a clear, triumphant voice. "All my children shall be saved. They are saved now!"

The next instant she fell back on her pillows, and was gone. Gone into the everlasting bliss, the everlasting home.

By what thorny paths they walked, by what anguish they conquered only Christ can tell, but one by one, while the mother lay in the death-cold sleep in her home her children sought her sacred little room, and, one by one, they came forth victorious. From the hour of her ascension they have been free from the curse. Years have passed. One son is in the Gospel ministry; another is a business man of unimpeachable integrity and large success. Geraldine's sweet presence is seen in the homes of want and penury. She is indefatigable in rescue work, and has peculiar tact and wonderful discretion in dealing with those whom others consider as hopeless.

And, over that rescued family, what joy is there not in heaven?

There were ninety and nine that safely lay, In the shelter of the fold,

But one was lost on the hills away, Away from the gates of gold.

And, let us say it over and over, and never weary of that song of redemption, the Shepherd sought that sheep till he found it.

O Jesus, ever patient,
To thee thine own will come,
And, day by day, to thee will pray,
Till safe thou bring them home.

might at any moment disgrace them, who, if she could get nothing to appease her appetite but the eau de cologne on the toilet table would drink that. The mother stood by her daughter with a divine forbearance and a compassion that never failed. It was impossible for the boys to succeed anywhere; they were notoriously unsteady, and nobody could trust them, but their mother was invincible in her gentle firmness, sheltering, shielding, and protecting them by every means in her power. One cable held, the cable of the mother's love, and by that, they were heaven-lifted from the deepest abysses of despair.

And always, in the little bare room, bea medicine merely. It will do her no harm. She must have it, and I cannot let her die, even to save your scruples."

Geraldine lived. The mother was right in her terror, the doctor wrong in his opinion. I have myself seen locked up buffets in houses where Geraldine was a guest: locked up lest she should stealthily visit them; have seen her fair skin bloated and covered with eczema; have steadied her staggering feet on the sidewalk, and all this before twenty-three years had gone over her head. She became at last that dreadful thing most revolting in a woman—a confirmed inebriate.

Her brothers, first Howard, then Ar-

A DREAM OF THE CHRISTMAS-TIDE

WHICH of us, in childhood's happy days, had not our Christmas dream—a vision that came to us in advance of the sacred season itself, and which promised so many and such beautiful things, that even Santa Claus was unable to translate them into realities? Half the joy of Christmas is in looking for Christmas joys, of course; just as half of all the pleasures of life lie in anticipation. It does no harm to "anticipate," provided we are not cross and depressed over it when all our dreams do not come true. For even half of a Christmas dream to come true, is really wonderful demonstration of prophecy's power to bring itself to pass. You dreamed, you know, when you were little; you mentioned your dream, of course; and equally, of course, somebody reported the matter to Santa Claus—or Santa's representatives; and reasonable fulfilment came about in the natural order of events. Which of us has not written a letter to Santa Claus, telling him a thousand-and-one things we would like to have, and then stuck the same in a convenient nook or cranny of the chimney-corner? Most of us have gotten in due time some of the things mentioned in these communications. If we had received them all—why we would have had to move out of the house ourselves, bag and baggage, to make room for the dolls and wagons, and toy-engines, and kites, and knives, and other commodities falling down the chimney upon us! It is well one does not always get everything one asks for.

The sad Christmas dream is that which may not be fulfilled—even in part—the dream of the child of the poor; or the dream of a lonely little one whose father or mother is in the Better Land, and to whom Christmas, under the best conditions, can hardly mean so much as it means to more fortunate children.

According to the artist's story, the little maid in our picture is having a very beautiful dream. There is the wonderful Christmas tree; the full stocking by the mantel; the little playmates coming with pretty offerings; the wee one happy with her doll; and, above all, the noble lady, her face serene and sweet with that brooding mother-love, which is more to the child-heart and child-life than any material gifts can be. The very "spirit of Christmas" is filling the room where the child sleeps. May every dream like this which visits the children of the poor before the holiday-tide just ahead of us be more than realized! Many good Christian people are busy now trying to bring such dreams true! They could not be busy in a better cause.

"Twelve Masterpieces of Art"

Mrs. A. E. D., Persia, Ill., writes: "Accept my thanks for the premium Art Portfolio. They are twelve reproductions of some of the world's famous pictures, which are masterpieces of art, clear, vivid and true. They are an attractive and valuable addition to any collection of pictures, which people will appreciate and enjoy. In the century past there has been little time to develop the artistic side of American culture; but there is a waking up to see the value of art education as a great factor in the higher life of the people."

it toward the child. "Why, 'Rastus, he's gittin' kindlin' fer me to use in the mornin'," said Elizabeth, her heart beating fast with pleasure at this token of tardy interest. He's awful smart fer his age, 'Manuel is; he helps me all the while. This mornin' when I was stemmin' gooseberries fer pies, he set an' worked at 'em as stiddy as I did. I wish't you'd notice him a little more, 'Rastus," she added, laying her hand on her husband's knee.

He recognized the tentative caress with a scowl, continuing to puff at his pipe a full half minute before he made answer. "I'm a-goin' to take consid'able notice of him f'om now on ef he's got to the pint whar he'll be useful," he said, rising from his chair and knocking his empty pipe against the door-post. "It's 'bout time I was beginnin' to realize a leetl somethin' on my val'able investment—he—he!"

He paused on his way to the barn to look more narrowly at the child, stooping to feel his arms and legs. "Fer all the world as if he was a colt or steer!" murmured Elizabeth, her eyes filling with indignant tears. She called the boy sharply. He came running toward her, his curling locks flying in the wind.

"Manuel!" she exclaimed, and held him fast, her eyes wide with sad forebodings.

The child wound his arms about her neck, "What is it, munny?" he whispered. "Nothin'!" said Elizabeth, shortly. "Come now, I'm a-goin' to put you to bed. You must rest while you kin, deary."

The boy drew himself up to his full height. "Here's lots of kindling, munny," he said joyously. "To-morrow I'm goin' to bring water from the spring. I won't spill it!"

"No—no, child," said Elizabeth, shaking her head; "I don't want you should carry water. I'm a-goin' to send you to school; you've got to get learnin'. Yes, I'm a-goin' to sen' you to school to-morrow."

She knelt by the open window for a long time after the child had fallen asleep, looking out with anxious, questioning eyes into the rosy splendors of the evening sky athwart which swallows flitted by twos and threes, crying shrilly to their fellows of night's approach. "I wish 'Rastus wa'n't so hard," she murmured, wiping away one or two slow tears; "seems 's'o he was made of stone. 'Twa'n't always so with him; when we was first married an' come to this house to live, I remember he says to me—'twas right down on the back porch of a summer evening like this—Lizbeth, he says, ef thar's anythin' I kin git fer you, or do fer you, all you've got to do is to name it. He was awful kind in them days, 'Rastus was; an' I was willin' an' anxious to work my fingers to the bone fer him. I don't know how it come—I didn't take notice—I know I never stopped a-tryin' to please him. But—"

She started to her feet with a faint exclamation of dismay at sound of his slow, heavy step at the back door. "It got dark so kin' of gradual like, husband, I didn't think to light up," she said apologetically, as she struck a match in the dark kitchen; "'s'long as I'm alone, thinks s' I, they ain't no use in wastin' ker'sene."

"Humph!" growled the man, "I know what you was doin' well 'nough. I reckon I'm jest a leetle mite smarter 'an you take me for, Mis' Winch. Now I'm a-goin' to set my foot down on this 'ere foolin' once an' fer all, an' you might 's well put yer min' to it first as las'."

"I—I don't know what you mean, 'Rastus," faltered Elizabeth, with an imploring look. "I ain't never neglected nothin' fer—fer him; you know I ain't. I never had better luck with the chickens an'—"

"That ain't the pint," he interrupted, dropping heavily into the one rocking-chair. "I've had my eyes peeled onto you—an' him, too,—fer quite a spell back, an' I see 'at yer idees wants overhaulin' on the subject. You ain't a-fetchin' up no fine gent'man, Mis' Winch, 'at's a-goin' to dress in broadcloth an' patent leathers when he's growed, any more 'an I'm a-settin' out to raise prize-winnin' trotters. I'm a-raisin' useful critters fer the farm, an' that's what you set out to do; but I guess you kin' of los' track of the idee all these years—eh?"

Elizabeth moistened her dry lips with a furtive look at the grim face opposite. "You ain't serious, 'Rastus, in namin' a child 'at's got an immortal soul along side of dumb critters, be ye? Course"—she made haste to add—"he'll help 's soon 's he's big 'nough. He doos 's much as ever he kin now. I—I was thinkin' we'd ought to sen' him to school, beginnin' to-morrow."

"You don't say," sneered her husband. "You're gittin' awful smart an' knowin' lately, ain't you? Mebbe we'd better sen' him to college an' make a pefessor outen him. Ef you git to thinkin' so, Mis' Winch, why o' course I ain't got nothin' to say. I gin in to ye once, an' so you guess you c'n come it over me every time; but I reckon you've got the wrong pig by the ear this time. Now ef you'll give me your 'tention, Mis' Winch, I'll tell ye what ye'r a-goin' to do—beginnin' to morrow. First off, you'll cut that redic'lous mop of hair off him, an' then—"

"I was a-goin' to cut his hair, 'Rastus; but it looked so pret—"

"I'm a-talkin', Mis' Winch. After his head's in order you c'n sen' him out to the barn to me. I'll fin' somethin' fer him to do. That's the kin' of school he'll git fer a spell."

Elizabeth's pillow absorbed more than one bitter tear that night. "Oh Lord!" she groaned, when the loud husky breathing at her side revealed her slackened chain. "Oh Lord! You love him more'n I do—more even 'an she doos, an' you kin take care of him. Don't let 'Rastus be ha'sh with him, Lord, cause he ain't much more'n a baby! Oh Lord—Lord—Lord!" The anguish of her fears found vent in dry, inarticulate sobs, which penetrated the wakeful ear of Omnipotence in guise of compelling petition. The answer was peace and deep sleep.

India's Sympathy for China.

BOMBAY, October 21, 1901.

Editor The Christian Herald:—It is with great pleasure that I enclose draft for fifty dollars for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD China Famine Fund, contributed or collected by readers of The Bombay Guardian, in accordance with a suggestion published in our columns from the pen of Rev. Robert Ward, who—as readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are aware—realized the terrible reality of famine last year in Gujerat, and whose sympathies were stirred by the accounts of fearful suffering in China, given in the columns of your paper. It was Mr. Ward's wish to have everything at this end done as simply as possible. He wrote: "We need form no committees, and we need waste no time in talk, because the Chinese Committee of the New York CHRISTIAN HERALD is in working order, and the editor of The Bombay Guardian will be only too glad to form a tributary centre from which our money can be sent to the central body." Mr. Ward's appeal has not been without response. Indeed, it is pathetic to know that a substantial part of the remittance now enclosed is contributed by the Indian Christians in the Godhra circuit; some non-Christians also responded to Mr. Ward's proposal. The self-sacrifice involved when Indian Christians give a certain amount in cash is enormously more than when a like amount is raised in England or the United States of America. Yours faithfully,

F. PERCY HORNE,
Editor Bombay Guardian.

DIVINE LEADING

The People of God Always Safe in Trusting Him . . .

By MRS. M. BAXTER

THE significant statement is made in the Bible narrative (Exod. 13: 17) that "It came to pass when Pharaoh let the people go that God led them." Would to God this were the experience of every soul which, through the blood of the Lamb, has been forgiven and set free from its past! God led the people about through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea. There was a nearer way, but the nearest way was not always God's way; and a people who would be led through the sea as on dry land must not be afraid to have first to pass through the wilderness. They might not leave Egypt a motley, disorderly crowd; God is not the Author of confusion (1 Cor. 14: 33). They marched "five in a rank" (verse 18, margin).

Moses did not forget the charge of Joseph, our centuries before, that when God should visit his people, they should carry up his bones into the land of Canaan with them. The restful faith of Joseph was justified, and in spite of all the haste with which the terrorized Egyptians thrust them out, Joseph's coffin was not forgotten, and when they reached the promised land his remains were buried in Shechem, in the land apportioned to his son (Josh. 24: 32).

The children of Israel understood now why they must eat the Passover lamb standing, with loins girt and feet shod; they were free, and every step they took increased the distance between them and their oppressors. The mighty God, whose wonders they had seen in Egypt, could draw nearer to them; he "went before them by day in a pillar of cloud to lead them the way, and by night in a pillar of fire to give them light, that they might go by day and by night: the pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, departed not from before the people" (R. V.). They had visible evidence that the Lord was with them. Were they better off than we are, who have God the Holy Ghost dwelling in us? Was God's direction more sure because they had a visible manifestation of God's presence? Did it keep them from fear and unbelief? The event proves that it did not have that effect.

But if God gives special privilege, he gives with it special responsibility and special testing. God commanded that his people should encamp by the sea. And Moses was to apprise the children of Israel that Pharaoh, when he heard of their encampment, would say, "They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in," and would follow them. And thus it came to pass. Pharaoh regretted his action in letting the children of Israel go, and he gathered together all his chariots to make one final effort to recover his emancipated slaves. The chariots and horsemen were rapid in their movements, and they overtook the children of Israel encamping by the sea.

Now the faith in God and Moses of the children of Israel would be put to the test. God had said Pharaoh would pursue them; it was by God's orders that they encamped; they had really nothing to fear; God had told them he would be honored upon Pharaoh and upon all his host. And yet it looked as though they had fallen into a trap and would be an easy prey to the enemy. "When they saw the Egyptians marching after them, they were sore afraid." They had seen the Egyptians smitten with plague after plague while they themselves enjoyed immunity in the land of Goshen. But now that their enemies were upon them, close to them, they believed more in the power of Pharaoh than in the power of God; they cried out unto the Lord, and they bitterly reproached Moses. It is only when our faith is tested that it becomes apparent what faith we have. At this crisis God's word counted for nothing with the people in comparison with what they saw. They judged God according to the sight of their eyes at the moment, instead of by his word and by his deeds in Egypt. He had done all which he had declared by Moses that he would do in that land, and yet now they acted as though he were not to be trusted! How did we treat God the last time some great difficulty assailed us? Did we trust or did we fear? Did we rest on his word or did we doubt him?

In this, their first test, they failed; what had Moses to expect in the future? It was a bitter wrong done to him; but he passed his examination at this juncture, and not a trace of wounded spirit or retaliation, or even of self-justification appears in the narrative. Thus Moses honored his God when his people failed him. Moses endured as seeing him who is invisible (Heb. 11: 27), while the people's eyes were on "the things that are seen" (11. Cor. 4: 18). Moses believed God, and said with his authority, "Fear ye not; stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord." Not a word about their insult to himself! While Moses spoke to the people he was still communing with God; but the time had come for action, the camp must be broken up. "The Lord said unto Moses, Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward. I will make it possible for them."

READERS of the CHRISTIAN HERALD well know the magazine SUCCESS, founded by Orison Swett Marden, and for some years of its early life closely associated with the CHRISTIAN HERALD. Its wonderful growth in circulation and prestige is a matter of frequent note and comment. No other American magazine is so widely quoted by periodicals of all kinds,—no other is more eagerly read by its subscribers, or perhaps has a greater influence in the world for the upbuilding of manhood and womanhood. THE SUCCESS IDEA is the broadest upon which any magazine can be founded; it has the widest ramifications; it means the most to every one. Yet SUCCESS is not a "one idea paper,"—it is a general magazine of the highest class, with a distinct literary flavor of its own. In the last two years its circulation has grown from 75,000 to over 300,000, and is still increasing by the steady, upbuilding demand of a people who know what they want—AND GET IT.

President McKinley's Last Words

"Good-Bye to All, Good-bye," is the title of a beautiful song, words and music by J. Reginald MacEachron. C. W. Marvin Publishing Company, Detroit.

The composition is of rare excellence, both words and music. It was suggested by and the theme is based upon the last words of the late President McKinley, and the refrain introduces a phrase of the late president's favorite hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee."

The first stanza reads:
"Nearer, my God, to Thee. How beautiful to know
That when our souls have passed away it is to Him we go,
Upon a snowy pillow lay a man with dimming eye,
Waiting for the end to come to bid his friends good-bye.

While others wept in sorrow, he smiled a peaceful smile,
And thinking of his future home, he murmurs all the while,
"Nearer, my God, to Thee," Thy will be done,
It is His will, not mine," etc.

The music has fine harmonies, and is suitable for parlor, church or funeral occasions. The title page is embellished with carnations, the late president's favorite flower.

If not obtainable at music stores, we will send, postage paid, for 25 cents.

GIFTS FOR OUR KING*

The Offerings of the Magi Typical of the Offerings that may Still be Made to the Living Saviour

VERY beautiful is that incident of the Magi following their celestial guide across the countries, that they might offer gifts to the newborn King. One is glad to think that his coming was greeted with some homage. His birth was so obscure, so humble, yet so momentous, as we realize at this day, that the greeting even of these mysterious strangers, redeems the world a little from its attitude of indifference. Their visit must have been a great surprise to all who knew of it, for there was nothing royal in the circumstances of the wondrous Child, to call forth such a tribute. But the wise men were wiser than they knew, for no king ever born in the purple was destined to wider rule, or more exalted station. If he were born in this time and men knew of it, what gifts would be laid at his cradle! How men would vie with one another in offering the choicest and most precious of the world's possessions! Now that we know him, and in some feeble measure understand what the world owes to him, there are no jewels too rich, no wealth too great, to serve as appropriate tribute to the Son of God. The honor of ministering to him would be sought by the world's wisest and most illustrious men, and his appearance would be hailed with acclamations from every land. It would not have to be said now, "He came unto his own and his own received him not." The gold, the frankincense of worship and the precious spices of devotion would show the world's grateful recognition of divinity incarnate.

No such opportunity can the world ever have. When he appears again, it will be in majesty and power, and there will be no merit in recognizing him then. But we stand between the two extremes, and what opportunities are ours? If we lament that we did not live in that early time, that we might have rendered him homage, how much better we can do so now? The gifts he craves, are gifts that we can make better now than in his human infancy. The homage of the heart and life are more welcome to him than the treasures the wise men brought. It was said of him that he should see of the travail of his soul and should be satisfied. Nothing else can satisfy him but the proof, living and practical, that his years of privation and hardship and his cruel death were not wasted. If he sees men inspired by his life to love him and walk in his steps, ready to bear reproach for his sake, ready to deny themselves for his love, ready to die in his cause, living higher and better lives, because of his life, he is satisfied. There is no gift that can be brought to him, or could have been brought during his sojourn in the flesh, that could please him like the gift a man may make of himself. To place ourselves at his disposal, to do the work in our generation that he did in his, to live for the salvation of the world and if necessary to die in seeking it—that is the homage he desires, and the homage we can render. And he would know. It is a fatal mistake to think of him as being at a vast distance, indifferent to what goes on in the world. "Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world." Is he here and we withhold from him that homage that he desires so much more than the homage that we flatter ourselves we would have rendered in his helpless infancy? We are insincere if we hold aloof from his cause, if we do not give ourselves unreservedly to his service.

The gifts of the wise men may be emblems of those we bring, as men in certain societies make the tools of the mechanic emblems of their conduct. They brought gold. That, too, we may bring, by labor and self-denial. His cause needs help; the poor and the needy are around us on every hand, and he has specially made them his representatives. "Inasmuch as ye did it unto them," he said, "ye did it unto me." And his loving measure of a gift fits every case. The poor widow, who cast two mites into the treasury, gave more than all the others. The liberality of the poor is precious in his sight, and the spirit in which the gift is made, whether by rich or poor is all-important. The gift that is made for love of him is the most precious of all, be it little or much, because it is the love that prompts it more than the gift itself, that he craves.

Then they brought frankincense, emblematic of worship. That, too, we can render. To reverence him, so that every act of our lives is consecrated to him; that in all we say and think and do, we look to his beautiful life, to see if we are in harmony with it; that he is made our pattern so thoroughly that, beholding as in a mirror, we are changed into his image—this is worship, the true frankincense grateful to his senses.

The wise men also brought myrrh. Its bitterness is symbolic of sorrow, and alas, it was an appropriate gift. We, too, have reason to bring it. Sorrow over our own sins and shortcomings; sorrow over the evil in the world, still so far from what it should have been after such a work as he did for its redemption; sorrow for the coldness and formalism of the church and for the worldliness that benumbs its energies; sorrow for the heathen at home and abroad, dying day by day without knowing how great a salvation has been wrought for them. He sorrows, too, over the same things, and we may bring our grief to mingle with his in sympathy. So on this anniversary of his birth we may come with the wisest of wise men, laden with gifts for our King.

THE CENTURY PLANT

HAVE you heard the tale of the aloe plant
Away in the sunny clime?

By humble growth of a hundred years

It reaches its blooming time!

And then a wonderful bud at its crown

Breaks into a thousand flowers;

This floral queen in its blooming scene

Is the pride of the tropical bowers;

But the plant to the flower is a sacrifice,

It blooms but once, and in blooming dies!

Have you further heard of this century plant

That grows in the sunny clime?

How every one of its thousand flowers,

As they drop in the blooming time,

Is an infant plant that fastens its roots

In the place where it falls on the ground;

And fast as they drop from the dying stem

Grow lively and lovely around.

By dying, it liveth a thousand fold,

In the new that spring from the death of the old!

Have you heard the tale they tell of the swan,

The snow-white bird of the lake?

How noiseless it floats on the silvery wave,

And silent sits in the brake,

It saves its song till the end of life,

And then in the last still even,

Amid glowing scenes of the setting sun,

It sings as it soars to heaven,

And the blessed notes fall back from the skies,

'Tis its only song, and in singing it dies!

Have you heard the tale of the pelican,

The Arab's gum-elbar?

That lives in African solitudes,

Where birds that live lonely are?

Have you heard how she loves her tender young,

And strives and toils for their good,

She brings them water from fountains afar,

And fishes the sea for their food.

In famine she feeds them what love can devise—

The blood of her bosom, and feeding them dies!

You have heard these tales, shall I tell you one,

A nobler and better than all?

Have you heard of Him whom the heavens adore.

Before whom the hosts of them fall?

How he left the choirs and anthems above

For earth in her wailings and woes!

To suffer the shame and pain of the Cross,

And to die for the life of his foes?

O Prince of the noble, O sufferer divine,

What sorrow, what sacrifice equal to thine!

Now hear these tales, you weary and worn,

Who for others do give up your all!

The Saviour has taught us the seed that grows

Into earth's dark bosom must fall,

Must pass from view and die away,

And then will the fruit appear,

The seed that seems lost in the earth below

Will return many-fold in the ear.

By death comes life, by loss comes gain,

The joy for the tear, the peace for the pain!

A Useful Christian Life

MANY readers have been interested in the accounts of humble Christian lives in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In a recent issue, there appeared the story of Mrs. Gideon Scofield, who, at 96, still found time and strength to work for the missionary cause. To-day we present a brief sketch of another veteran in well-doing. Mrs. Harriet N. Bennett, who was born in Chenango County, New York, February 5, 1816, was converted at the age of 14 years and united with the Baptist Church. She has always led an active and useful life. Her natural eyesight is perfect, and she sews and reads without the aid of spectacles. She anxiously waits the coming of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Monday of each week. While she works, it is always near to read while she rests. Mrs. Bennett has many friends in New York and Michigan, who know of her beautiful Christian life, and love her for the example she has given of a noble, earnest, simple nature, who lives for others rather than for herself, and strives to do the Maker's will in all things.

A Missionary's Escape

In the life of Chalmers, the recent martyr of New Guinea, the following incident is related: "There grew up among many of the people a great respect and admiration for this majestic man, who was always grave and kind, gentle to women, little children, and the distressed. He was a peace-maker everywhere, and always an agreeable companion, so that they trusted him implicitly and were proud to call him 'friend.' Even non-Christian natives often warned him to avoid unfriendly tribes, and would accompany him rather than have him go alone. Some years ago a treacherous massacre took place at Kalo. It was important to bring the ringleaders to account, and to show the people that the British Government would not allow such atrocities. Chalmers went alone and unarmed to inquire into the facts of the case, but suffered no harm. On another occasion he resolved to visit the chief of a wild tribe, notorious for his many deeds of treachery. A woman on the beach warned him not to land. When he did so the crowd seemed threatening, and when he approached the chief his present was declined with something like disdain. Seeing the serious aspect of affairs, he said to his companion, 'Gould, I had better get away from here. Keep our eyes all round, and let us make quickly for the beach.' The crowd followed, one man with a club uncomfortably near. 'I must save that club,' said Chalmers to himself, 'or I fear the club will have me.' Talking to the savage all the way, he skilfully diverted his attention by an attractive present, seized the club, rushed to the beach, and gained the boat just in time."

"Too High Up"

It is related of the late evangelist D. L. Moody, that a man rose in one of his meetings and gave his experience. "I have been for years on the Mount of Transfiguration." How many souls did you lead to Christ last year?" was the sharp question that came from Mr. Moody in an instant. "Well, I don't now," was the astonished reply. "Have you done any?" persisted Mr. Moody. "I don't now that I have," answered the man. "Well," said Mr. Moody, "we don't want that kind of mountain-top experience. When a man gets so high that he can't reach down and save poor sinners, there is something wrong." The vision on the Mount of Transfiguration must lead to the healing of the denizen in the valley.

With the December Number Begins the Brilliant and Remarkable Story

BELSHAZZAR

A TALE OF THE FALL OF BABYLON

By WM. STEARNS DAVIS

MR. DAVIS' strong novel, "A Friend of Cæsar," introduced him to literature. This new story will establish his reputation as one of the great modern writers of fiction. "Belshazzar" will undoubtedly prove one of the strongest serial stories that has been published in any American magazine for a long time. There is hardly a more impressive or dramatic episode in the whole Bible narrative than the Feast of Belshazzar and the terrible "Writing on the Wall" which foretold the doom of the arrogant Babylonian Monarch.

With this gorgeous background Mr. Davis has written a story of intense human interest. He has studied the available sources of information, and presents a most real picture, palpitating with life, of this bewildering Queen of Ancient Cities; he throws much light upon the Bible narrative, but the chief claim the novel has to attention lies in its intrinsic interest. The Persian princess Atossa (married against her will to Belshazzar), the grimly cruel monarch himself, and his dark counsellor, the High Priest of Bel, impetuous Darius (future King of Persia), white-haired Daniel and his beautiful daughter—all these chief figures in the story stand out sharply and vividly amid the breathlessly exciting course of the drama, which reaches its climax at the scene of Belshazzar's Feast. The chapter heads give some idea of the story:

|--------------------------------|---------------------------------|--------------------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| I. Great Babylon. | VI. The King of the Bow. | XI. Belshazzar's Guests Forsake Him. | XV. The Writing of Jehovah. |
| II. Belshazzar the King. | VII. The Triumph of Bel. | XII. Belshazzar Pursues in Vain. | XVI. The Fulfilment of Jehovah. |
| III. The Yoke of the Chaldees. | VIII. Bel Totters. | XIII. Ahura Prevails Over Bel. | XVII. The Humbling of the Chaldees. |
| IV. Glory of the Chaldees. | IX. Avil Marduk Gives Counsel. | XIV. Belshazzar Secures His Prey. | |
| V. The Spell of the Maskim. | X. Cyrus, Father of the People. | | |

It is a notable work, strong, vigorous, unusual, and of deepest and most vital interest. It will be elaborately illustrated, and, beginning with the December issue, will be one of the great features of EVERYBODY'S.

But this is only one feature among hundreds that will fill the coming year. No American Home should miss the monthly visits of this BEST OF AMERICAN MAGAZINES.

WHAT WAS THE STAR OF BETHLEHEM?

It was a Miraculous Supernatural Light, Says President Clark

UNITED SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, ELEMENT TEMPLE, BOSTON, Mass., November 27.

To Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I have never been able to accept the view advanced by Kepler and worked out by Dr. Ideler, of Berlin, that the Star of Bethlehem was the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, though the theory is a curious and interesting one, especially in view of the near approach of these two great worlds in this year of grace. How they could stand over "the place where the young child was," however, I do not see, nor does the theory that it was a comet, a constellation or a meteor seem to be any more reasonable. In fact, I am forced back upon the old theory that it was a supernatural light which shone from heaven for this occasion only, and guided the wise men to the cradle of Christ. This theory seems to me to present fewer difficulties than any other, though, of course, it is not free from them; but I have no more difficulty in believing in this miraculous occurrence than in many others connected with the life and death of our Lord.

FRANCIS E. CLARK.

It was a Heaven-stone or Aerolite Says Dr. Talmage

I think it was a uranolith or heaven-stone, such as we all have seen flash to the earth. A night not long ago I saw in the northern sky, a light drop with such brilliancy and precision that if I had been on a hill as high as that of Bethlehem, on which the shepherds stood, I could have marked, within a short distance, the place of the alighting.

The only difference between the aerolite that dropped on Bethlehem and the aerolite to be found in our modern museums, was that an especial and Divine impression called the people who saw the former to watch its course, as leading to something wonderful.

T. DEWITT TALMAGE.

Science Cannot Explain the Star of the Magi, Says Astronomer Serviss

All of the attempts to explain the apparition of the Star of Bethlehem on astronomical grounds are unsatisfactory and unconvincing, because none of them gives a valid account of the succession of appearances presented by the Star as described in the New Testament.

We are told that the wise men, when they were in the East, noticed the star and traveled toward it. Evidently they saw it in the western sky, since they were led into Palestine which lay to the westward of their own country.

A brilliant new star, like the recent one in Perseus, or a bright comet setting after the sun, or even the planet Venus appearing as an evening star, might have seemed to the wise men in the East a portent hanging over Palestine. But when they arrived in Palestine, the narrative says, the star "went before them till it came and stood over where the young child was."

This, if taken literally, implies a change in the apparent position of the star, planet or comet, which would be utterly impossible in nature. A comet retreating from the sun through the mid heaven might, it is true, rise higher night after night as the travelers slowly approached Palestine, until, when they had reached that country, it appeared overhead; but it is only by doing violence to the words of the narrative that such a phenomenon could be fitted to the description.

Besides, a comet so extraordinary in appearance would have attracted universal attention, and would have been recorded in the traditions and annals of many nations.

Similar objections lie against the theories which seek to identify the star of the magi with the planet Venus, or with a "new star," or with a conjunction of the larger planets. In regard to the last named phenomena, it should be noted that only a single star is spoken of in the New Testament, whereas a number of planets in conjunction would have appeared as a constellation of stars.

Anyone who is determined to find a natural explanation for the mysterious star would do better to assume that it was some luminous phenomenon in the atmosphere, but the science of meteorology would, after all, furnish little or no support to such a hypothesis.

In brief, I do not think that any acceptable scientific explanation of the phenomenon can be found. By that I do not mean to say that there may not have been some natural appearance which misled the Magi, or which was misinterpreted by them. I merely mean to say that, knowing the vagaries of the Oriental imagination, it would be idle to try to guess upon what basis of natural fact the story of the Star of Bethlehem arose.

Has Seventy Grandchildren

NOT a few among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are to be counted among the nonagenarians. Among them are those who are nearing the century mark. One of these patriarchs, who is now nearing the close of a long life spent in well-doing, is Andrew Gillespie. He was born in Warren County, Kentucky, June 4, 1805, and moved to Illinois with his parents in 1811. At the age of sixteen he united with the M. E. Church, and it is remarkable that all through a long life, he has been an almost constant attendant at "the house of the Lord." Even now, at his great age, he attends as often as the weather will permit. Mr. Gillespie has been twice married, the first time in 1826, and the second in 1876, to Mrs. Eliza L. Hall, his present wife. "Grandpa Gillespie," as he is familiarly called, has had fourteen sons and daughters, of whom seven are still living. He has seventy grandchildren, sixty-seven great-grandchildren, and five great-great-grandchildren. He is still strong and hearty, takes great pleasure in reading, never wears glasses, and finds his chief solace and delight in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of which he has been a subscriber for fifteen years.

Miss Stone Still Alive

In view of the alarming reports from Turkey, about the death of Miss Stone, the American missionary, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cabled a message of inquiry to President Washburne, of Robert College, Constantinople. The following answer, received by cable, shows that the reports that Miss Stone had been murdered by the brigands are unfounded. Bebek is on the Bosphorus, a short distance from the Turkish capital:

To attain this end we employ the best trained talent of Europe and America, changing our case designs each year. Thus purchasers of Ivers & Pond Pianos get not only the best result musically, but the latest thing in style of cases. Our beautiful catalogue mailed free.

Good, and Fraud, and Error, since she no longer had her friend with whom to rest from all the noise and talking. So she sent messengers in all directions, and they came to the shores of the lake and asked the nymphs, whom they saw playing in its waters, for news of her they sought. At first the water-maidens would not speak, but in course of time the messengers made them understand they came from a great person. Then they hastened down and informed Silence of all that had taken place in her absence, of the terrible war that had broken out and laid whole countries waste, and that she was longed for to bring peace and quiet after all the riot and confusion. So with a heavy heart she bade farewell to her dear, new-made friends, and came back to the light of day. But things were sadly changed on earth, and no one knew her. Of the children whom she had once taught many had fallen in battle, and not one remained. Quite a different generation had sprung up, and she felt strange among them. Sadly and wearily she toiled on till she reached the heights where stood the castle of Truth. But even here the babble of tongues and sounds of strife came from the world below. And Truth herself looked worn and weary; she seemed to have aged, and she had lost all heart to strive to make men better, they were so rough, so wild, she told her friend that it was a hopeless task. Silence was full of self-reproach when she heard this and saw that Truth had missed her, and that the world had grown so much worse in her absence.

It seemed, indeed, as if no place were left for her; the forests were cut down, so she could not recognize any of her old haunts; a robber band had taken up their abode in the beautiful ruin; everything seemed desecrated. Only the quiet resting-places of the dead were unmolested. She would linger round the tombs, thankful that this refuge had at least been spared, out of so much she once might call her own. Elsewhere all was confusion, lawlessness, and license. In all this turmoil and unrest, Silence thought with longing of the cool, quiet place under the clear waters of the lake, and of her who dwelt there, Purity, who scarcely dares to show herself on earth, since she would stifle in the air we breathe.

At first Silence scarcely knew how she could set about her work, how make her influence felt, in all this uproar. Two hideous monsters, Hate and Revenge, had taken up their abode in the world, and seemed to rule. Hate was a fiery dragon; Revenge a serpent with a hundred coils. The winged dragon, Hate, flew through the air, laying waste, waste, burning and destroying with its stilet breath; and the serpent of Revenge crept along over the whole earth at lightning speed, and those who escaped its venomous fangs were crushed and stifled in its deadly coils. It was horrible to see the vastation wrought by these foul monsters.

The Triumph of Silence

But Silence felt no fear. She went her way, and cast no glance at either of them, while they disputed whose prey she should be. They thought they would make easy work of one weak girl, and the dragon darted down upon her from the sky and tried to scorch her with his fiery eyes; but as she looked back at him with her calm, steadfast gaze, without a quiver of the eyelids, the fire was quenched, and the great, unwieldy creature grew weaker and weaker. Then Revenge came creeping along, singing, and just prepared to spring. But Silence set her little foot upon its head, and underneath that light tread the horrid creature might twist and turn—it was powerless for harm. The monsters could not understand it, they who had kept all mankind in fear and dread so long, should be defeated thus. None came to their assistance, and they felt that the quiet strength of Silence was much greater than their own.

Silence had conquered, but she could not let them nor drive them altogether from the world. During her long absence they had grown so big and strong, from feasting well, and preying on all around them, that all she could do was to crush their strength and curb their venomous fury, so that they might not continue to lay the whole world waste.

Thus did Silence begin her work, by setting them free from their direst foes. And she made her home once more in their midst, and not among them, and her influence spread, little by little, for men in truth were sick of warring and brawling, and hailed with delight the gentle presence that brought them peace. Even the stillness of Night had been broken by their angry clamor, and Sleep no longer visited their weary eyelids till Silence came to close them. Silence is the best of comforters. She lays her fingers on the lips of Death and takes away his horrors, and his hard-fixed look on the dear dead features passes at that tender touch. Her strong-aid is among the dead; there she will linger, giving her time in case the living should once more drive her from their midst. And mortals in their direst anguish raise their eyes to the Towers of Silence, and pray for her return to rule the world.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

THE STORY OF CHRISTMAS EVANS*

"Little Christmas"

CHRISTMAS EVANS was born at Esgairwen (Ysgarwen), in the parish of Llandysul, in Cardiganshire; he was born on Christmas Day—and hence his Christian name—in 1766. His parents, Samuel and Johanna Evans, were in the poorest circumstances; his father was a shoemaker, and although this profession has included such a number of men remarkable for their genius and high attainments, it has never found the masters of the craft greatly remarkable for the possession of gold or gear. His mother, by her maiden name Lewis, came from a respectable family of freeholders in the parish; but the father of Christmas died when he was a child—and these were hard days of poverty, almost destitution, for the poor struggling widow and her family—so her brother, James Lewis, of Bwlchog, in the parish of Llanfihangel-ar-Arth, took little Christmas home to his farm, engaging to feed and clothe him for such labor on the farm as the poor boy might be able to perform. Here he stayed six years—six miserable years; his uncle was a hard, cruel man, a selfish drunkard. Christmas used to say of him, in after years, "It would be difficult to find a more unconscionable man than James Lewis in the whole course of a wicked world." During these, which ought to have been the most valuable years of his life, no care was taken of his heart, his mind, or his morals; in fact, he had neither a friend nor a home. At the age of seventeen he could not read a word, he was surrounded by the worst of examples, and he became the subject of a number of serious accidents, through which he narrowly escaped with his life. There is an erroneous impression that, in those days, he was a great boxer, and that he lost his eye in a fight; the truth is quite different; he was not a boxer, and never fought a battle in his life. He lost his eye after his conversion, when he and some other young men were attempting the work of mutual help, in making up for lost time, by evening meetings, for various works of instruction; a number of his former companions waylaid him at night, beat him unmercifully, and one struck him with a stick over the eye. In after years, when some one was jesting before Robert Hall at Welsh preachers, upon his mentioning Christmas Evans, the jester said, "And he only has one eye!" "Yes, sir," he answered, "but that's a piercer; an eye, sir, that could light an army through a wilderness in a dark night." So that in his sightless eye, Christmas Evans, like the one-eyed Spirdion, the noble witness in the Nicene Council, really "bore in his body a mark of the Lord Jesus."

His First Revival

At Lleyn, Christmas Evans tasted the first prelections of a successful ministry; a wondrous power attended his preaching, numbers were gathered into the Church. "I could scarcely believe," he says, "the testimony of the people who came before the Church as candidates for membership, that they were converted through my ministry; yet I was obliged to believe, though it was marvelous in my eyes. This made me thankful to God, and increased my confidence in prayer; a delightful gale descended upon me as from the hill of the New Jerusalem, and I felt the three great things of the kingdom of heaven—righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." Indeed, very unusual powers seemed to attend him. He says, "I frequently preached out of doors at nightfall," and the singing and the praising seem to have touched him very tenderly; he frequently found his congregations bathed in tears and weeping profusely. Preaching was now to him, as he testifies, a very great pleasure—and no wonder; quite a remarkable revival of religious feeling woke up wherever he went.

His Last Sermon

Leaving the house of Mr. Griffith, of Tredegar, he proceeded on his way, preaching at Caerphilly, Cardiff, Cowbridge, Bridgend, and Neath, and he reached Swansea on Saturday, July 14th. The next day, Sunday, he preached twice—preached like a seraph, says one of his memorialists; in the morning his subject was the Prodigal Son; the evening, "I am not Ashamed of the Gospel of Christ." He was the guest of Daniel Davies, the pastor of the Welsh Baptist Church in the town, the blind preacher, as he was called, a man of great celebrity and unquestioned power. He was to be the last host of his greater brother, or rather father, in the ministry. On the Monday evening he went out to tea with a friend, who was always glad to greet him, Mr. David Walters; and on the same evening he preached in English in Mount Pleasant Chapel; his text was, "Beginning at Jerusalem." He was very feeble—perhaps we need scarcely wonder at that, after the two services of the day before.

"Beginning at Jerusalem! Why at Jerusalem?" he asked his audience. "The apostles were to begin there, because its inhabitants had been witness to the life and death of Christ; there he had preached, wrought miracles, been crucified, and rose again. Here, on the very spot of his deepest degradation, he was also to be exalted; he had been crucified as a malefactor, he was now to be elevated in the same place as a king; here were accorded to him the first fruits of his resurrection." This was the strain of the sermon: "At Jerusalem, Lord?" "Yes." "Why, Lord, these are the men who crucified thee: we are not to preach it to them?" "Yes, preach it to all." "To the man who plaited the crown of thorns, and placed it on thy head?" "Yes; tell him that from my degradation he may obtain a crown of glory." "Suppose we meet the very man that nailed thy hands and feet to the cross, the very man that pierced thy side, that spat in thy face?" "Preach the Gospel to them all; tell them all that I am the Saviour; that all are welcome to participate in the blessings of my salvation; I am the same Lord over all, and rich unto all that call on me." Such were some of the most characteristic passages. As he was coming down the pulpit stairs he said, loud enough to be heard by many present "This is my last sermon!"

And it was even so. He was taken very ill during the night; the next day he was worse, the next day worse still, and then medical assistance was called in. On the Thursday he got up and walked for some time in the garden.

But on Thursday night he was worse again, and on Friday morning at two o'clock he said to his friends, Mr. Davies, Mr. Hughes, and others round his bed, "I am leaving you. I have labored in the sanctuary fifty-three years, and this is my comfort, that I have never labored without blood in the basin,"—the ruling power of imagination strong in him to the close, evidently meaning that he had never failed to preach Christ and him crucified. A few more remarks of the same character: "Preach Christ to the people, brethren. Look at me; in myself I am nothing but ruin, but in Christ I am heaven and salvation." He repeated a verse from a favorite Welsh hymn, and then, as if he had done with earth, he waved his hand, and exclaimed, "Good-by! Drive on!"

While he was dying, the old mountain days of travel came over his memory—"Good-by!" said he. "Drive on!" He turned over, and seemed to sleep. He slept indeed. His friends tried to rouse him, but the angelic postman had obeyed the order—the chariot had passed over the everlasting hills. So he died, July 19, 1838, in the seventy-third year of his age, and fifty-fourth of his ministry.

and Cannot be Boiled as Quickly as in Low.

The curious experiences people have with coffee drinking are worth pondering over if one is ailing and does not know the exact reason thereof.

Coffee is a secretive worker, and through nervous system affects different parts of body in different people.

A young married woman, Mrs. T. L. Blackman, Oswego, Montana, had a conclusive experience in the effects of coffee on her eyes. She says, "I have used coffee since a child, and a short time ago my eyes began to grow weak, and the least exertion such as reading or sewing would cause shooting pains and very lines of light so that I could see but very else for minutes at a time.

This alarmed me and I earnestly sought the cause of the trouble. Someone told me that coffee sometimes affected the eyes. I at once decided to quit it and see if I would be benefited, but I must have something to take the place of coffee, for I wanted to modify as much as possible, the sacrifice of giving it up. So I decided to try Postum for myself. When it came I made it strictly according to directions and was wonderfully surprised and pleased with it. Husband says that my stomach is very different, indeed, from that he drank at a friend's table.

I frankly own that I like Postum better than ever liked coffee. It has a rich body to it and coffee lacks. I boil it longer than twenty minutes and it improves it. Perhaps it requires longer boiling in the high altitudes. I think it does.

For three months now I have been using Postum and have been wonderfully benefited. My eyes no longer pain me, and are strong as they ever were. My complexion, instead of being sallow as formerly, is clear and rosy. I know to a certainty that my improvement has been caused by leaving off coffee and using Postum, for that is absolutely the only change I have made, and I have taken no medicine. A Mr. Randall, a friend of ours, has obtained relief from his stomach trouble and headaches by leaving off coffee and taking Postum. We think we know something of the facts about coffee and about Postum.

THE CONJUNCTION OF PLANETS

A Rare Spectacle in the Heavens

By Prof. Young, Princeton Observatory

AS letters have come to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, from various quarters, inquiring as to the character and significance of the extraordinary planetary conjunction during November and December, the subject was referred for interpretation to Prof. C. A. Young of Princeton Observatory, a recognized authority. His answer describes the unusual collection of planets in the evening sky. Venus came into conjunction with Jupiter on Sunday, Nov. 18, about 1 a. m., and passed Saturn about 2 a. m. the next morning, so that on Sunday evening all three were very near together, Venus being about three degrees south of the other two planets. Jupiter continued to approach Saturn until the 27th of November when it passed him about half a degree to the south, so that in a spy-glass or telescope of low magnifying power, both planets were in the same field of view, the apparent distance between them being less than the moon's diameter. Prof. Young adds:

"It is hardly necessary to say that at the time of the conjunction, the three planets are at very different distances, Venus being about 74½ millions of miles away, Jupiter more than 550 millions and Saturn about 950 millions.

"Such a gathering of the three planets in the evening sky is a very rare occurrence. Conjunctions of Jupiter and Saturn occur about once in twenty years; but only about one in six of them are so situated that the planets are evening stars so placed that it is possible for Venus to join them; and when the opportunity occurs, it is only seldom that she takes advantage of it. Probably it will be a thousand years or so in the long run between such triple conjunctions.

"As to its importance as affecting in any way the conditions or course of events upon the earth, it has absolutely none. Doubtless, some very sad events will come after it, somewhere or other on the earth, and will be, by some, attributed to the overwhelming malignity of Saturn, overpowering or reversing the benignant influence of Jupiter and Venus. Just as certainly, other most fortunate and happy events will also follow, and other astrologers will attribute them to the planetary configuration. But every really intelligent person knows that there is not the slightest actual connection between such accidental alignments of planets in the sky and events upon the earth. The persistent survival of astrological superstitions is one of the most remarkable illustrations of the childish weakness of human intellect, in strange contrast with its grasp and power in dealing with other matters.

"Nor is the conjunction of any significance even astronomically: it affords no opportunity for any important observation which cannot be made just as well at other times, except, perhaps, for a comparison of the reflecting powers of the surfaces of Jupiter and Saturn.

"But it is pleasant to think that we have been privileged to see a beautiful grouping of the moon and planets, which no one living ever saw before or will ever see again."

A CHRISTMAS HYMN

O'ER Bethlehem's hills there shines a star,
It sends its radiant beams from far;
Proclaiming to a waiting earth,
The tidings of a Saviour's birth.

CHO.—Shine on, O Star of Faith, shine on;
O Star of Hope, we come! we come!
O best of gifts, sent from above,
Shine on, shine on, O Star of Love.

The wise men of the East, are there
With gold, and frankincense, and myrrh:
But, better far, to thee, we bring
These hearts of ours, O Christ, our King.

O Day-Star of our souls arise,
Send health and healing from the skies,
Give comfort by thine own sweet rays,
And help us as we sing thy praise.

Light of the world, shine on! shine on!
Till every heart to thee is won;
Fulfilling thus, thy blessed Word,
That all shall know and love the Lord.

Christmas at the Bowery Mission

GREAT preparations are being made at the Bowery Mission for the Christmas festivities. As early as three o'clock in the morning, the doors will be thrown open, and fragrant hot coffee, with large, delicious Bath buns, will be served to the homeless men and boys, whose deplorably destitute circumstances compel them to walk the streets to keep from being frozen to death.

It is sad that these unfortunates should number way up into the thousands, but sin and vice will have their harvest as long as poor, weak humanity will yield itself to their treacherous embrace. Many of these men and boys would gladly return home, where fathers and mothers, nearly broken-hearted, are ready to welcome them, but they either lack the means, or fear that they may be humiliated and repulsed by those whom they have so grievously offended.

When they once get to the Bowery, they are no longer the rosy-cheeked, fresh, light-hearted, happy country boys they were when they left their parents' home, to seek their fortunes in the wide, wide world. They are conscious of the change, and sometimes wonder if father or mother would know them again, were they suddenly to open the front door.

The liberty they craved seemed so sweet when they started away; but they have had a hard time of it, and oh! how hope to a thousand families and to thousands of sad, sorrowful, grieving hearts. In the afternoon, Mrs. Bird's Christmas tree will contribute to gladden a thousand little ones and make them feel that Santa Claus is no respecter of persons, but loves the children of the poor as well as those of the wealthy. What a sight to see a thousand children, all thinly clad, with parched faces, but large, lustrous eyes, and on the very tiptoe of expectancy, watching every movement, while waiting to hear the welcome sound of their own name, that calls them forward to receive perhaps the only gift of that glad day, which to others is one unbroken succession of delightful surprises. May God help the children of the poor!

Then in the evening comes the turkey dinner. On this occasion Superintendent Hallimond and Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the "Mother of the Bowery Boys," preside, while Professor Victor H. Benke, one of the converts, enlivens the event with the grandest music the magnificent organ is capable of yielding. Five hundred hungry men join in singing hymns, while in the kitchen adjoining the Mission the most extensive preparations are going on to provide a feast that shall remind them of the days when, obedient and pure, they sat around the table of their father's home, where there was enough and to spare. Just as Mrs. Bird gets through telling the men how good God is to pro-thankful they would be could they only once again get back and be at home with their loved ones! Now they are on the street, with no one to care for them, while at home, night after night can be heard the sad refrain—"Where is my wandering boy to-night?" If you have a boy adrift in the world, do something to help the Bowery Mission to bring cheer and warmth on Christmas Day to the countless multitudes that will crowd its doors, eager to be among those who shall enter while yet there are food and drink for the famishing.

While the breakfast is going on upstairs, down in the basement the tireless workers of the Bowery Mission will fill the baskets of mothers and children, to whom, but for the good Christian people of this land, Christmas would only accentuate and bring into stronger relief the misery which is theirs. It is hoped that there will be enough to fill a full thousand baskets, and thus bring happiness and vide so plentifully for their needs, Superintendent Hallimond signals, and the men arise and sing, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow"—after which the waiters, in white aprons, come marching in, carrying trays literally burdened with a most tempting display of carved turkey, huge slices of bread, apples and steaming coffee.

This being served, Mr. Hallimond reminds the throng of One who can save from the uttermost to the uttermost, and advises them to make this anniversary of the Saviour's birth the turning-point in their lives, and assures them that if they but will it, they may eat their next Christmas dinner with the dear ones at home.

Friends, it is for this work that we ask your help. Give what you can. God will surely repay it a thousandfold. All contributions should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, where they will be promptly acknowledged.

Preaching to the Poor

A recent report of Salvation Army work in India says: "The Army cannot boast of great gatherings of high-caste Hindus or Mohammedans, although among our officers and soldiers there are beautiful converts from these classes, but we can speak of a present army of 40,000 soldiers and adherents won for Jesus from among the poor and the outcast."

"Twelve Grand Pictures!"

Miss Jennie Gilmore, New York City, writes: "Your beautiful Art Portfolio has been received, and I think it is really superb, and so does everyone that has seen those twelve grand pictures. I intend to have some of them framed, for they are worthy of a prominent place in any home."

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Jan. 15

1. Is Memory or Imagination the greater gift, and which is the more valuable to man?
2. In what sense, if any, can the collection box be regarded as an index of the spiritual condition of a church?
3. A very young person asks: "Is a Christian boy or girl supposed to live the same quiet life that an old Christian lives?" How should he be answered?
4. Is the Christian Church growing more or less spiritual?
5. Waiving the question of the desirability of church socials, should a social for the benefit of the church be held in the church building?

Questions of the Week

1. What three kings were denounced in the Old Testament in the same words and threatened with the same fate?

In the Old Testament, Jeroboam, Baasha, Ahab, kings of Israel, are each denounced in the same words and threatened with the same fate. "Thou hast provoked me to anger and made Israel to sin," are the words of denunciation; and the fate threatened is the complete destruction of their posterity and that in a most shameful manner, for it is declared of him that dieth of each of these kings in the city shall the dogs eat, and him that dieth of these in the field shall the fowls of the air eat. The reference to Jeroboam is I. Kings 14: 9, 11; to Baasha I. Kings 16: 3, 4; and to Ahab I. Kings 21: 22, 24. R. E. HOUGH.

Correct answers have been received also from Louisa A. Young; A. S. Harmon; Joseph Shackelford; John H. Sherrard; C. J. Rawlins; Lottie Harris; Dr. N. P. Hackett; S. Menchin; R. G. Kean; A. Lesh; F. L. Sawyer; M. Baxter; Margaret R. Gold; H. W. Hamilton; R. A. Luker; Henry M. Douglas; D. B. Stoup; Mrs. F. E. Frost; M. R. D. D.; F. J. Strayer; Louise M. Kelso.

2. When, where and how did the custom of publicly burning mortgages or notes on churches originate? Is it of American or foreign origin?

It probably originated in England during the agitated period of the Reformation, when it was customary for the ruler to give warrants to his favorites for the possession of monasteries, or even the castles, property, and persons of those of different faith. If, armed with such force as they could muster, the royal warrants could be enforced, well and good. Frequently, however, they met with resistance and defeat, in which case the warrants were sent without the accompanying force, and if the party against whom they were drawn felt sufficiently secure, he would then call his retainers, and, after reading the message, publicly burn it to show his contempt for the same. This was frequently done in feudal times, the burning signifying the utter destruction of the thought conveyed in the warrant. P. F. S.

3. Does God repent? If not, how are we to understand such passages as Gen. 6: 6; Jer. 42: 10, where he is said to do so?

In the first passage cited, the word rendered repented is yinnahem; it is derived from naham, to pant, to groan, then to lament, to grieve because of the misery of others, and also because of one's own actions; whence, to repent. This is a peculiarly strong anthropomorphic expression which presents the truth that God, in perfect consistency with the truth that he "changeth not," assumes a changed position relative to man who had voluntarily changed his position, morally and spiritually, in relation to God. Man changed his position, God did not; but because of man's change God's position toward man was necessarily different from what it was before man changed and became sinful. In the second passage, the word repent, does not indicate any change in the nature or purpose of God, but a change in his conduct to man. It implies, in this connection, a pledge that all the severity of God toward the impenitent will give place to mercy when the wicked become penitent. B. F. WHITTEMORE.

It is evidently impossible for our finite faculties to form any adequate conception of God, his being, attributes, or character. Any revelation he may make of himself must therefore be incomplete. It must also be made in terms of human experience, otherwise it would be entirely incomprehensible. When, therefore, God is said in Scripture to love, to hate, to be angry, to be grieved, to repent, we are to suppose, since we cannot

"see the world." This opening century, where the young man must act his part, presents complex problems, civic and social, untried and magnificent opportunities, and an inexorable demand for instantaneous and intelligent action. Only the man with a comprehensive view of life as it is, will be equal to the demand. And nothing fits a man for this broad view, or enlarges his self-sided point of view, as travel. Seeing life in its wide difference, in our own country, and contrasting it with European countries, makes a man appreciate the heritage of American birth. A wholesome young man of the right sort, usually turns from the crowded life of cities, where his lack of home connection might subject him to temptation, and seeks the liberty of a rude civilization. This is not a spirit of rashness, but in the city-bred is a primal instinct to return to life under first conditions, where man still wrestles with unconquered nature. Without such an experience, the city young man is liable to lack that virility and respect for rugged truth that is the saving salt of manhood. The country-bred young man turns polish of manner of which the home-keeping youth may be ignorant; but all this is at the expense of other more important attainments. The young man who is kept closely at home, and who is taught to work, is the one who in after life develops into the useful Christian man.

Stay, stay at home, my heart and rest,
Home-keeping youths are happiest.
But they who wander they know not where,
Are full of sorrow and full of care;
To stay at home is best.

EMILY H. WATSON.

5. Would it tend to decrease the number of divorces if all clergymen would agree not to solemnize a marriage when either of the parties had a divorced partner still living?

Not to any considerable extent. It would not affect the class which contributes more than any other to the business of the divorce courts—the class which cares nothing whatever for the sanction of the clergy, and would be just as well pleased to have the ceremony performed by an alderman. Nor would it affect those persons who are fully intending to lead a single life after getting a divorce. They would get a divorce anyhow, and only later, when the opportunity of another marriage came, would they be affected by the concerted action of the clergy. So as to both these classes, the attitude of the ministers would have no effect at all in reducing the number of divorces. There remains the one class of persons who want divorce for the purpose of marrying another person, and only those in that class who would shrink from a union unblesed by the church. That is a very small class, for the husband or wife who has allowed his or her thoughts to settle on another person, must have sunk so low as to care but little what the clergyman may or may not do. Such concerted action, so far as I can see, would operate only to prevent some people who are divorced getting married again, and I am not sure that this would be either just or desirable, especially in the case of the innocent party to the divorce. If the bar to a remarriage is a punishment, why should the innocent be punished? But that is another question, which is not involved in the question whether such action on the part of the clergy would tend to reduce the number of divorces. EDWARD WRIGHT.

The united action or inaction on the part of the clergy upon any important moral question has a great influence upon society at large. More than most Christians imagine and that non-Christians are willing to admit, their power over the lives and hearts of men is more or less effective for good among all people. The unanimous refusal of clergymen to solemnize a marriage while either party has a divorced partner still living would have tremendous weight in overcoming the present laxity and in demonstrating the sanctity of the marriage relation. The educational effect in course of time would undoubtedly be fewer divorces, and appropriate legislation more in accord with Scripture authority, which justifies divorce but for one certain cause only. The direct and immediate effect would be a less number of such marriages, certainly itself a good step in the right direction. WALTER W. HUBBARD.

How to Frame Our Art Portfolio Pictures

Hundreds of readers who have received our beautiful Art Portfolio, write us that they think so highly of the twelve exquisite pictures contained therein that they wish to hang them upon their walls, and they ask our advice as to the best manner of framing them. The following suggestions are according to the consensus of opinion of the highest art authorities in New York City:

Use an oak frame, one to one and one-half inches wide. Choose for the color of your wood, the darkest—or nearly the darkest brown—found in your pictures. A beveled frame sloping from the outer to the inner edge is best, as this gives more depth and better perspective to your picture; however, a flat frame is in good taste, and some of these in richly-grained wood are very effective. Have no mat; according to latest and most artistic methods, your frame should come close to the edge of your picture, just concealing the latter.

The average price of such a frame as we have described is from 75 cents to $1.00; for this, you should get a well-finished oak frame with good glass. In imitation, and cheaper glass, frames can be had as low as 35 cents.

The People's Verdict

Concerning THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Art Portfolio, containing Twelve Superb Reproductions of the World's Masterpieces, each measuring, without Margin, 9 X 12 inches

The Pictures are Exceptionally Fine

Mrs. S. P. W., Georgetown, Mass., writes: "I want to thank you very much for beautiful premium (the Art Portfolio), which I received last week. We think the pictures are exceptionally fine, and think you are very kind to give such a superb present."

Far Surpass Expectation

Clara M. B., S. Norridgewick, Maine, writes: "I have received the Art Portfolio premium of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the pictures far surpass anything I have been expecting."

Every One Deserves a Frame

Mrs. J. R. D., Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "We received this morning THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Art Portfolio. Every one of its very pretty pictures well deserves a frame. Long live THE CHRISTIAN HERALD! May it continue in the future as it has in the past, to be a blessing to all the nations of the earth. Our family has taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from its first number."

Pleasure Mingled with Surprise

Miss A. H., Bedford, N. Y., writes: "I wish to thank you most sincerely for the beautiful Art Portfolio received some days since. It surpasses all my expectations, though my expectations were high. Each picture is a gem, but I particularly enjoy 'The Father's Welcome Home,' 'Inspiration,' and 'Ever Faithful.' My pleasure is mingled with surprise; surprise that you can afford to be so very generous. With deep appreciation of your kindness."

An Artist's Opinion

Mrs. C., Toronto, writes: "I thank you very much for the Pictures, received safely, and much admired by all friends, especially the dog's head. As I am a bit of an artist, nothing pleases me so much as pictures well chosen."

Masterpieces of Picture-makers' Art

Mrs. C. L., Virginia, writes: "I have received your premium of twelve beautiful pictures. I have shown them to many of my friends, and all agree with me in pronouncing them not only a masterpiece of the picture-maker's art, but in thinking that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is, indeed, most liberal and gracious to its subscribers."

Most Enjoyable Christmas Gift

Mrs. S. W. C., Lowell, Mass., writes: "The 'Art Portfolio' received. I return you sincere thanks. I think that no Christmas gift which I may receive can give me more enjoyment. They are all beautiful, but a little the best of all I like: 'The Father's Welcome Home,' which is being framed as a Christmas present for my son, who has two little ones of his own."

Every One a Gem

H. R. B., Omaha, Neb., writes: "Your promptness in shipping the 'art' gift is characteristic. As for the pictures, they are each and every one a real gem, fine enough to grace the walls of wealth. They will prove delightful adornment to every place where art-love exists. It is a matter of surprise to me how you can give such premiums with your paper—such good value in itself."

If you wish to be included among the possessors of this Superb Premium, you should not delay a moment to send in your subscription. Every Subscriber, whether new or renewal, gets one, as long as the supply will last understand the reality of God's mental operations, that the design of the statement is "to accommodate heavenly things, so far as their nature will admit of it, to the similitude of earthly things;" and that God, in harmony with the laws of his being, regulates his conduct somewhat as men do under the influence of these emotions. Thus in Gen. 6: 6, we may understand that God was "grieved in his heart" at the wickedness of men just as a father is grieved by the disobedience of a wayward son. But since God is infinite in his perfections, this change of conduct cannot imply any change in him; it only means that in different conditions a new line of conduct becomes necessary so as to harmonize with the principles of his being. JNO. G. OSBORNE.

4. Is it better for the average young man to leave home to "see the world" or to remain steadily at home, except for occasional periods of limited travel, which do not break off his home connection?

If the young man has fixed principles and runs away from no duty, by all means let him instinctively to the broadening friction of city life, to rouse his aspirations, and give them definite, practical mould. Travel, as no other university, educates a young man for his day and generation, which, if his life be worth while, like Abraham of old, he must serve.

R. N. SCOTT.

"Home-keeping youths have ever homely wits," says Shakespeare. This may be true. Yet "homely wits" are more conducive to the development of sterling, upright character, than the "wits" of sharpers, gamblers and libertines, and it is with such characters that the roving youth is likely to be thrown. The young man who grows up under the quiet influences of a Christian home, and especially if that home be in the country, has an opportunity for the formation of principles which is utterly impossible to the youth who is thrown into all varieties of evil association, away from the restraining influence of home and friends. It may be, perhaps, that the young man who goes abroad into the world, may gain knowledge and acquire an ease and

INDIA'S SPIRITUAL HARVEST

America's Gifts to India's Starving Millions Bearing Fruit in the Salvation of Souls

FROM missionaries in India, of many denominations, cheering reports are coming of large accessions of converts. Almost unprecedented are the numbers applying for baptism. The barrier to the missionaries' work in the past was prejudice, and that is yielding to the gratitude naturally evoked by the magnificent benefaction of Christian lands. Large numbers of natives who did not need relief in the famine confess that their views of Christianity have been changed by the wonderful spectacle of their countrymen being fed by Christian hands. Political motives might account for the help rendered by the British Government, but there is no way of explaining the grand gifts of money and corn that came through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, except the motive of compassion arising from Christian principle. They did not know that Christianity was a religion that prompted its disciples to deny themselves in order to feed strangers who were hungry. The beautiful object-lesson is doing its work. There is less opposition to the work of the missionaries and multitudes are enrolling themselves who rode on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD corn carts rejoicing over the arrival of the food from America; but that very night he was stricken with cholera and died.

"The work of our mission in this country is intensely interesting. Ten years ago we had scarcely the beginning of a Christian community; seven years ago the forward movement began. This year began with about five thousand Christians and will probably close with nine or ten thousand, and beyond this there are approximately ten thousand persons who are known in their neither the very lowest nor the poorest. They include Dhegs (Weavers), Chamadis (Chumars) Bhangies (Sweepers), and some from other classes. There are signs of a break among other large classes. From among the Coolies (aboriginal tribes), there are already some converts.

"During the visit of Bishop Foss and Dr. Goucher, our whole church was stirred with the news that they had a baptismal service at which 250 were baptized, but on my visit to Gujerat the work had so grown that I was permitted to participate in the baptism of 1,339. A little under two-thirds of these were from among those who have been gathered up during the time of famine, and a little over one-third from among the people of the villages. In the future all the baptisms will be among the village people. Practically all the orphans have been baptized. I have seldom been more moved than when at Baroda, when I learned that over 300 people walked in from the surrounding country to attend religious services and to be baptized, and none of them walked less than seven miles, and some of them under the banner of Christ. The following letter from Bishop Warne, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is typical of other reports, which are coming from Baptists, Congregationalists and missionaries of other denominations:

"One can but wonder that our missionaries and other workers who gave their lives up to working in the midst of these diseased, starving and dying people, survived to tell the tale. Most of our Methodist missionaries were severely ill, and Rev. T. M. Hudson actually died a martyr in the work. In God's good providence, the others recovered, though some of their children succumbed to the prevalent disease. Among the bereaved parents are Rev. and Mrs. George W. Park, who lost a dear boy. He was one of the children respective villages as Christians, because they have ceased to worship idols and have identified themselves with the Christian community; but are not baptized because we have not the workers ready to teach them, nor a sufficient number of missionaries to supervise the work. There is easily in our mission in the Gujerat country a Christian community of twenty thousand Christians in sight, and this has all come about practically within seven years! This is one of the miracles of modern missions and something over which we should give thanks to God. There are eleven million Gujeratites, and nearly a million of these belong to the class from which these twenty thousand are coming. Who can tell whereunto this will grow?

"The castes from which these converts have come are came as far as twenty miles. One woman walked seventeen miles and then walked back seventeen miles to her home, carrying her baby the whole distance.

"Many of those people have suffered great persecution. During the week that I was there, I heard of not less than four Christian houses being burned; but I heard of not one who thought of recanting, but every one purposed to hold fast and live for Christ.

When one remembers that beyond them there are, already about ten thousand waiting for baptism, and these ten thousand mean ten thousand more, and so on, he can but rejoice. The leaven is leavening the lump; prophecies are being fulfilled; and God is accomplishing his great purpose among the heathen nation. Praise his name."

UNTRODDEN PATHS

TEXT—Joshua 3: 4:

"Ye have not passed this way heretofore"

IN December, 1889, I waded the river Jordan, and although the current was strong, I was able to bear up against it; but in the time of spring freshet, when the snows on Mount Lebanon melt, nothing but a miracle would enable anyone to cross this river. It was at the dangerous springtime that Joshua and the officers of his army uttered the words of my text to the people who were in a few hours to cross the Jordan. About that crossing we say but little, because, on a previous occasion, we discoursed concerning that piling up of the waters into crystal barricade. We only speak of the march to the brink of the river. No stranger thing has ever occurred in all history.

The Ark of the Covenant was a brilliant chest of acacia wood, overlaid with gold, on the top of which were two winged figures, facing each other. It was five feet long and three feet wide. Poles were thrust through the rings at the side, and by these poles the ark was lifted. This splendid box was to be carried three-quarters of a mile ahead of the hosts of Israel on the way to the crossing. That distance between the box and the advancing thousands must be kept because of reverence. There was a sanctity in that divine symbol that they must observe by keeping off three-quarters of a mile away. They must watch that glittering box, and follow, otherwise they would lose their way, and not arrive at the right place for crossing. They had never been there before, and they must be guided. For that reason Joshua utters the words of my text, "Ye have not passed this way heretofore," and the subordinate officers at the head of the regiments repeated it: "Ye have not passed this way heretofore."

What was truthfully said of the ancient Israelites may be truthfully said of us. We are making our first and last journey through this world. It is possible, as some of my good friends believe, that this world will be corrected and improved and purified and floralized and emparadised as to climate and soil and character, until it shall become a heaven for the ransomed, but I do not think it. I have an idea that heaven is already built somewhere. Our departed friends could not wait until this world is fixed up for saintly and angelic residence. Having once gone out of the world, I do not think we will come back, except as ministering spirits to help those who remain in the earthly struggle, or perhaps to look at the wondrous spectacle of a burning planet.

Why Men Lose Their Way

But leaving that theory aside, we are very sure that we are for the first time walking the earthly pilgrimage. "Ye have not passed this way before." Every minute is a new minute, every hour a new hour, every century a new century. Other folks have gone over the same road we are traveling, but it is our first trip. New appearances, new temptations, new sorrows, new joys. That is the reason so many lose their way. They meet some one on the road of life and ask for direction, and wrong direction is given. We have all been perplexed by misdirection after asking the way to some place we wished to visit. Some one said to us: "Take the first road to the right, and having gone a mile on that road, take the first road on the left, and you will soon reach your destination." We took the advice, but our informer forgot a turn in the road, or forgot one of the roads leading to the left, and we took the wrong road and were lost in the woods, and night came on, and we were put to great irritation and trouble.

The fact is, I blame no one for making lifetime mistakes. I pity them instead of blaming them. There are so many wrong roads, but only one right one. You cannot in mid-life draw upon your youthful experiences for wisdom, for mid-life is so entirely different from youth. You cannot in old age draw upon mid-life experiences, for the two stages of existence are so diverse. What is wisdom for one man to do would be folly for another to undertake. A man of nerve and pluck is not qualified to advise a man timid and shrinking. An achievement that would be easy for you might be impossible for me. Human advice is ordinarily of little value.

So, also, it may be said to every nation, "Ye have not passed this way heretofore." Our own republic is going through novel experiences. Could wisest statesman twenty years ago have prophesied present conditions? Every President, every Congress has new crises to meet and new questions to settle. So prophecies made about conditions in this country fifty years from now may turn out as far untrue as the prophecies made fifty years ago by the greatest of American statesmen, when he declared on yonder Capitol Hill that it was unwise to think of civilization or prosperity the other side of the Rocky Mountains, and according to his belief the Pacific coast would be the perpetual abode of barbarians and mountain lions, and we must not think of annexing those forbidding regions.

The Path of the Nation

Many prophecies in regard to our nation failed, and many prophecies concerning its future will fail, because it is traveling a new road. Every step it takes on that road is a novelty. The opinion of a Monroe or a Jefferson in the far past is not of as much value as the opinion of our wisest men now. How could men know in 1823 what it would be best for this nation to do in 1901? It is belittling as well as unwise for our statesmen, who are quite equal to the statesmen of the past, and who have, in addition to the natural talents of their predecessors, attainments in knowledge that were impossible in any decade but our own, to depend on advice of men who have been dead three-quarters of a century. In all other things the world has advanced. Can it be that in statesmanship it has gone back, and that this opening of the twentieth century must consult the opening of the nineteenth century? "Ye have not passed this way heretofore."

Yea! our entire world is on a new pathway. It may be swinging in the same old orbit as when by the hand of the Almighty immensity was sprinkled with worlds, but it has been rocked with earthquakes, and scorched with volcanic fires, and whelmed with tidal waves, and wrought upon by climatic changes—cities sunk, and islands lifted, and mountains avalanched into valleys. So it is another world than that which was first started in the solar system; yet it is all the time changing, and will keep changing until the hour of its demolition. Of this beautiful world, this lustrous world, this glorious world, it may be said, "Ye have not passed this way heretofore."

What is the practical use of this subject? Instead of putting so much stress upon human advice, and instead of asking of the past what we ought to do, follow the divine leading as the men of Joshua followed the golden-lidded chest of acacia, which was the symbol of the divine presence. Not human but divine leadership, Joshua not consulting with his colonels and lieutenants, but consulting with God—the God of individuals, the God of nations, the God of worlds.

That three-quarters of a mile distance between the ark or sacred box and the front column of Joshua's troops mightily impresses me. It was a forceful way of teaching reverence for the Almighty. They needed to learn that lesson of reverence, as we all need to learn it. Irreverence has cursed all nations, and none more than our own. Irreverence in the use of God's name; hear you it not on the streets and in social groups, and is not a profane word sometimes thought necessary to point jocosity?

Irreverence for the Scriptures

the phraseology of the Bible often introduced into the most frivolous conversation and made mirth-provoking. Irreverence for the oath in court-room or custom-house or legislative hall by the conventional and mechanical mode of its administration. Irreverence for the holy Sabbath by the way it is broken in pleasure excursion and carousal. Irreverence on the part of children for their parents, insolence being substituted for obedience. Irreverence for rulers, which induces vile cartoons and assassination. Irreverence in church during prayer, measuring off song and sermon by cold, artistic or literary criticism, and in prayer time neither bowing the head, nor bending the knee, nor standing, as one does in the presence of earthly ruler, thus showing more respect for a man than to the King of kings. We ask not for genuflections or circumflexions or prostrations, but when prayer is offered let us either bow the head or bend the knee, or let us in some way prove that we are not indifferent. In how many places have presumption and foolhardiness taken the place of reverence! That three-quarters of a mile between the chest of acacia covered with gold and mounted with wings—a symbol of the divine presence—and the marching regiments of Joshua suggests a reverence that is woefully lacking in social life, in legislative hall, and religious assemblage. A farmer went to the wheat field taking his son with him. The child said: "These stalks that stand straight up must have the best grain. Those stalks that bend over cannot be worth anything." Then the father broke off two of the tops of the stalks and said, "Child! that one that bends clear over has the grain." It is the soul that bows in deepest reverence which is the best soul.

But though Joshua's host observed the three-quarters of a mile command, they followed the ark, and you will do well to follow the divine leading, as the path you tread now has not yet been trodden. "Ye have not passed this way heretofore." Many of you are suffering from just such annoyances as have not occurred in your history. There have been meannesses practised upon you, or you have received slights, or you are the subject of misinterpretations, or you are in the midst of sore disappointments, or there are demands made upon your strength and time more than you can meet, or some physical ailment is laying siege to your castle of health or you are under embarrassments that you cannot mention even to nearest friends. You say: "Well, I never saw anything like this. I never expected such treatment as this. I never thought it possible to be placed in such circumstances." And when you say all that you are only translating the words of my text into your own phraseology. If you had suffered something like this before you would have known what to do, but here is flank movement for which you are not ready.

In Personal Experience

As you have had no experience of this kind upon which to draw for wisdom, and as you cannot fully state all the circumstances to any human ear, go to God and tell him all about it. He knows already, but it will relieve you and help you if you tell him.

Perhaps it is a bereavement. You have felt sorrow for those who lost children, or thought you did, but now that the sorrow has come to your own nursery, it is a different thing. You never could have imagined the silences about the house now that the little feet are quiet and the infant voice has ceased its prattle. What a sensation at eventide with no one to put to bed! What toys put away to be looked at on anniversary days. How Christmas Day is shadowed and the world is changed! Get over it? You never can get over it in this world. Perhaps it is your first sorrow. "Ye have not passed this way heretofore." God grant that you may never pass this way again.

But follow the ark, and it will lead you to rivers of consolation. You will find that your child has gone into a heaven of children, a land where children are in vast majority—a score of infant souls to one manly or womanly soul—for the vast majority of the race die in infancy. It is the exception when people live to grow up. Heaven a great playground for children. Palaces for kings and queens? Oh, yes. But what wide halls of pleasure, what gardens of delight, what raptures such as on earth with ball, and kite, and hoop they never felt! Let him go, mother.

You Can Trust Him

in the land of music and flowers. The front door of that eternal home was opened by him who said: "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." What a time the children have up there! Can you not almost hear their quick feet on the ivory stairs? What rounds of gladness! What laughter of eternal glee! Follow the ark, and it will lead you to the crossing into the reunions of the home where you will never part.

As our sorrows are new, our joys are new, and all our experiences are new. Our life is one long discovery of things that we did not know and could not know, because we have not passed this way before. We have found, for instance, that gratitude is the rarest of virtues. You used to suppose that if you do a kindness it will be fully appreciated and reciprocated. You have found out by experience, as you could have found out in no other way, that gratitude is apt to be only another axe to grind. While there is a possibility that you may return still more service, you are thanked, but when you can return no more advantage you are dropped. Here is a man whom you have helped in political elevation. When the time comes for the compliment to be returned you are not only refused help but you receive positive opposition. You have found out that you should do the right thing not with respect to reward or gratitude, but because it is the right thing to do.

No one has come to mid-life who has not been stung of ingratitude. On the battlefield of Alma in 1854, a wounded Russian was crying in anguish of thirst for water. Captain Eddington of the English Army, ran to him and gave him drink. As the captain was running by to join his regiment the wounded soldier shot him. Almost all languages have proverbs setting forth this perversity. English proverb: "Bring up a raven and it will pick out your eyes." Arabic proverb: "Eat the present and break the dish." Italian proverb: "The ass, after having drunk, gives a kick to the bucket." An old proverb says: "If God were to be so complacent as to carry us on his back to Rome, we would not thank him for his pains if he did not also set us down in an

GOLDEN DEEDS IN THE IRON CITY

HOW THE POOR OF PITTSBURG ARE BEING HELPED AND COMFORTED THROUGH THE KINGSLEY HOUSE SETTLEMENT

THE world's better half is not only finding out how the other half lives, but is helping the other half live better! In this noble ministry of the privileged to the non-privileged, the social settlement, now multiplying throughout many cities, is becoming a very helpful factor; and the Kingsley-House Association is Pittsburg's representative of this organized humanitarian influence.

Kingsley House passed the first epoch of its history, and found its voice and mission in the Iron City, in its earlier location on Penn avenue. But the enterprise as now a permanent, ample and strategic home in the old Montooth mansion, at the corner of Bedford avenue and Fulton street, the building and grounds, together with the architectural additions essential to the proposed work, having been donated to the Association by Mr. H. C. Frick.

If Pittsburg were a fortified city of the feudal type, the inevitable castle and fortress would stand just about where the Kingsley House is now situated. And the location of this helpful home of the neighborhood on the rocky crest, which forms the last water-shed between the Allegheny and the Monongahela, and only one short mile from where they unite to form the Ohio, gives the institution a topographical outlook which ought to be suggestive and prophetic of its social and moral mission. It looks westward upon a crowded commercial triangle. But as Pittsburg's great, cute angle of commerce includes as yet both the retail and the wholesale business, as well as hundreds of the unappropriated residences of the time when the Bluff now occupied by the Kingsley House was Pittsburg's residential quarter, it follows that his quarter is interspersed and surrounded by a greater relative population. Pittsburg's vicious resorts are in this triangle, and Pittsburg's Chinatown; and beyond his angle the windows of Kingsley House look out over Allegheny City, and over the populous South-Side, and far into the engthening West-End; so that, with the dense and comparatively poorer population of its immediate environment, this institution has within the practical, humanitarian radius of one mile fully one-half the homes, the better and the worse, the richer and the poorer, in all the Greater Pittsburg; and the Greater Pittsburg now comprises 600,000 people.

There is very little abject poverty in Pittsburg. When they found the presumably poorest woman in the lower angle of the city, she said: "Yes, I guess there's some right poor folks about here some 'eres; but it must be fudder down the street!" But, as in all American communities, the keenest poverty is proud and elusive, and must be shrewdly found. The poverty of the Orient, is dressed in rags and flaunted in the street; but the poverty of the Levant, especially the poverty of the citizen as contrasted with the mere subject, more especially still the poverty of the American, hires a little room in a respectable quarter, and dies of starvation rather than publish itself, or else registers at a first-class hotel and commits suicide!

With quick appreciation of this elusive nature of American poverty, the various forms of activity in Kingsley House are so planned as to avoid any such appearance of charity as might wound or dwarf the spirit of independence. The kindergarten in connection with the house claims a tuition fee of five cents a week, the men's club, including reading-room privileges, an annual fee of three dollars; and the cooking-school, the medical dispensary, the manual science classes, and all kindred forms of work, are kept upon this high level of American helpfulness.

A very proper exception to the rule of independence is the Summer Home up the Allegheny, where, from the first of July to the first of September, weary mothers with their little children are given a recuperating home in groups of twenty, each group remaining one week, thus giving rest and the ethical tonic of country air and sunshine to one hundred and sixty tired children of the poor, during the heated term.

The resident faculty of workers has a very efficient leader in the person of Miss Mary B. Lippincott, a woman whose genius for the work is born of that love of the neighborhood which is the soul of the true settlement-house. The head worker is faithfully assisted by several resident workers, including Dr. Rachel Robins, Miss Alice Perry, Miss Ellen Watkins, Miss Ella Johnson, Miss Margaret Gillespie and Miss Flora Dunlap; while, as a very important auxiliary, some fifty non-resident helpers are devoted to the enterprise.

When one thinks of the personal equipment of Kingsley House, of its increasing facilities, and of the opportunity which appeals at once to the best endeavors of the household and the liberal support of the city, one is ready to read the prophecy of its future from the pages of Bunyan: "And I saw in my dream that they went on; and Great Heart went before them."

easy chair." You will never be happy in this world if you do not do all the good you can and look for no responsive gratitude. All the damage I did a man who's my enemy was to take him from a position where he received $700 a year salary into a position where he has ever since received $2,500 a year. He never forgave me, but has pursued me with a pen vitriolic ever since. The worst enemy you ever had is the man you introduced and favored and helped. But be not disturbed or even irritated. You are no better than your Lord. If the world had had any thankful appreciation of his coming it would have filled that Bethlehem caravansary with flowers, which bloom there clear on into the December month; and Herod, instead of attempting his death, would have sent a chariot to fetch the infant to the palace; and the oyer and terminer of Pilate's courtroom would have pronounced him not guilty; and instead of a cross and a crown of thorns, it would have been a coronation, with all the mighty ones of the earth kneeling at the foot of his throne.

Another discovery that surprises us, because we had not passed this way before, is the fact that if two be in quarrel or in war with each other, the one who is the most wrong is the hardest and the slowest to make up. Who wrote them I know not, but I cut these two lines out, and pasted them in my scrapbook twenty years ago, for the words are so strikingly true:

Forgiveness to the injured does belong,
But they ne'er pardon who have done the wrong.

We talk about the great discoveries of the age—the electric power, the steam power, the telescopic and microscopic power—but do not say anything about the discoveries we all make year by year and day by day. There are surprises all the time. It is a new road we are traveling. "Ye have not passed this way heretofore."

But closely allied is the other fact which we hinted at in the opening—that we will not pass this way again. This is our only opportunity for doing certain things that ought to be done. On all sides there are griefs we ought to solace, hunger we ought to feed, cold that we ought to warm, kind words that we ought to speak, generous deeds we ought to perform. All that you and I do toward making this world better and happier we must do very soon, or never do at all. There is no retreat. Alertness and fidelity would not be so important if we could truthfully say: "I will be back here again. The things I neglect now I will do the next time I come. I will be reincarnated, and I will resume my earthly obligations. Having then more knowledge than I have now, I will discharge my earthly duties better than I can now discharge them. I do not give solemn farewell to these obligations and opportunities, but a smiling and cheery goodbye until I see them again." No; we cannot say that. There will be no new and corrected edition of the volume of our earthly life. After we make exit from the stage at the close of the fifth act we cannot re-enter. How many millions of people have lived and died I know not, but of all the human race who have gone, only seven persons that I now think of have returned, the son of the widow at Nain, the young man of Nain, the ruler's daughter, Tabitha, Eutychus, Lazarus, and Christ. Among all the ages to come, I do not suppose there will be one more who will return to this life, having once left it.

Lord Bacon said that he who shall discover the way to make myrrh soluble by human blood will discover immortal life on earth, but no such discovery will ever be made. With what suggestive solemnity does this thought charge every hour of our earthly existence! It is said that it is possible to know which way the wind blew at the time of the deluge by the mark of the wave still to be found in the sand, and the direction of our influence, will leave a mark that will last forever.

At this point I ask you to notice the fact that my text does not call attention to the crossing of the Jordan, but to the way leading thereto. We all think much of our crossing of the Jordan when the march of our life is ended, but put too little emphasis on the way that leads to the crossing. What you and I need most to care about is the direction of the road we are traveling. We need have no fear of the crossing if we come to it in the right way. In other words, we need not care about death if our life has been what it ought to be. We will die right if we live right. That was a glorious thing that Montmorency, Constable of France, said, when dying from his wounds in battle. Some one standing by advised him to show the same courage in dying that he had shown during his lifetime. To this he replied: "Gentlemen and fellow-soldiers, I thank you all very kindly for your anxious care and concern about me, but the man who has been enabled to endeavor to live well for four score years past can never need to seek now how to die well for a quarter of an hour."

What an absurdity it would have been for Joshua and his men to have asked each other questions like these: "How can we cross the Jordan if we get there? Will not the water be too deep to allow us to wade? Will we not all be so saturated that we may lose our lives by exposure? How many of us can swim? Had we better not wait until the annual freshet has subsided?" No such folly did they commit. They were chiefly anxious about the way that they had "not passed before" and were ignorant of, and to keep their eyes on the golden-covered acacia box, wing mounted, which was the Ark of the Covenant.

O, hearer, stop bothering about your exit from sub-lunary scenes. By the grace of God, get your heart right, and then go ahead. If the Lord takes care of you clear on to the bank on this side of the river, I think you can trust him to take you from bank to bank, from the willows on this side the stream to the palms on the other side, from the last kiss of sorrowing ones on this side to the welcome, saintly cherubic, seraphic, deific, on the other side. Keep your eye on the ark, and, whatever betides, you will go through all right.

One Easter morning Massena, the Marshal of France, appeared with 18,000 armed men on the heights above the town of Feldkirch. There were no arms to defend the town, and the inhabitants were wild with terror. Then the old dean of the church cried out: "My brothers, this is Easter day. We have been depending on our own strength, and that fails. Let us turn to God. Ring the bells, and have service as usual." Then the bells rang out sweetly and mightily from the church towers of Feldkirch, and the people thronged to the houses of prayer for worship. The sound of the bells made the enemy think that the Austrian army had come in to save the place, and Massena and his 18,000 soldiers retreated. By the time the bells had stopped ringing there was not one soldier in sight. So put your trust in God, and when hosts of troubles and temptations march for your overthrow, ring all the bells of hope and faith and Christian triumph, and the threatening perils of your life will fall back, and your deliverance will be celebrated all up and down the skies. The God who led you through the way you never passed before will be with you at all the crossings.

MAGDALA BY THE SEA OF GALILEE

ON THE SEA OF GALILEE

RUINS OF CAPERNAUM

VI.

THE SEA OF GALILEE TOWNS

By REV. T. F. WRIGHT, PH.D.

IN the Old Testament not much is said of the towns about the Sea of Galilee. Dan, a few miles north, is fully described; and from the time of Abraham unto its capture and renaming by the Danites, and then on in the days of the northern kingdom, it is frequently mentioned. Merom or Huleh, the little lake in the large meadow, lying between Dan and the Sea of Galilee is mentioned, especially in connection with the battle there in which the Israelites, under Joshua, vanquished their northern foes (Joshua 11). Hazor, Kadesh and other places not far from the sea are named, but the list of cities given to the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali (Joshua 19), does not contain the names of which we hear so much in the New Testament.

The name of the sea was then Chinneroth, and this name in later time took a form which we have as Gennesaret. The name Galilee, meaning "circuit," was at first applied to a limited district, but the Romans extended it over the northern province, and all the people of the province were called Galileans. The name Sea of Tiberias, which is used in John 21, was later than our Lord's time, and came from the city built in honor of Tiberius Cæsar, and now alone remaining of the shore cities, once so numerous.

The reason that this fertile district was not more fully occupied in Old Testament times is probably the same as that which accounts for the present absence of towns, and that is the lawlessness of the region. Herod won renown and power by exterminating the robbers of that locality, and to-day the traveler is more exposed to danger here than elsewhere. Everyone carries weapons and looks out for prowling bands.

For a skilfully drawn account of the district as it was in the time of our Lord, the reader is referred to A Day in Capernaum, by Dr. Franz Debitzsch, and to Galilee in the Time of Christ, by Dr. Selah Merrill. Both these writers make use not only of the New Testament, but of the account given by Josephus, who places the population and the number of boats at almost fabulous figures. But Josephus was personally acquainted with all that he described there.

In addition to Tiberias, above mentioned, we have on the eastern and more hilly and wild side Gergesa, which is connected with the legion of devils and the swine; and also, on the easterly side not far from the Jordan, a part of Bethsaida, where the multitude was fed. Then, passing westward, we have the rest of Bethsaida and Chorazin, of which we know little more than the names, and then Capernaum, and then Dalmanutha, and Magdala, the home of Mary Magdalene. There were other places known to Josephus.

As to Capernaum, the scene of so many events in our Lord's life that we may call it his home, there is a serious difficulty which only extensive excavations can remove. Opinions are divided between two places now known as Tel-Hum and Khan Minyeh. This division means that, taking into account all that we can read, especially in Josephus, some decide that Capernaum stood where Tel-Hum is, and where there are the ruins of a synagogue and other strong buildings, while others favor Khan Minyeh.

In favor of Tel-Hum is the name, but the locality is not as well adapted to a large city as is Khan Minyeh. This place is two miles southwest of Tel-Hum and is at the head of the Plain of Gennesaret, which extends for two miles along the western shore of the lake and runs back a mile, affording a garden spot of unsurpassed fertility. Surrounded on three sides by hills, sloping on the fourth side eastward to the shore, well watered by springs lying at its back and sending their waters through it to the lake, this plain was capable of supporting, and did support, an immense population.

One marked trace of the past remains in an aqueduct which carried the water around the face of the hill at the head of the plain and toward Tel-Hum. This cutting in the rock is about four feet wide and is used as a road, and travelers sometimes take it for a road originally, but it is most likely a part of Josephus's aqueduct. We might think of Capernaum as having covered both Tel-Hum and Khan Minyeh, as Bethsaida was on both sides of the Jordan, but it seems scarcely likely, as towns were usually compact.

Our Lord with his disciples often walked upon this shore, and it was of a sower on the plain that he spoke the parable of the seed. There were the trodden lines of travel where the plough could not break the surface, and there were the thorns which now hold the ground in full possession.

The people were fed not only from the plain but from the lake. It was only thirteen miles long by eight wide at the widest, but it teemed with fish of several kinds. This was due to the fresh flowing river always pouring in from the melting snows of Hermon and to the warmth of the valley, for the surface of the water lay eighth of a mile below the ocean level. There is probably not a better place for fish in the world, and certainly none is known.

The fishermen in boats about twenty feet long—the "ships" as the Bible has it—used nets which they drew sometimes into the boats and sometimes to the shore, especially if the net was heavy with evidently a large catch. A man also waded out and used a small net. Peter no doubt did when he caught the fish with the money in its mouth. Usually, however, we see in the Gospels the use of the larger net like a seine, which was weighted on one edge and floated on the other, and was paid out from the boat, and then drawn in by both ends. The fishing was usually done at night, when the boat would cause the fish less alarm. When the men came ashore they sorted the fish and took the best to the town and cast the bad away, Matthew 13:48. In the forenoon they would be mending their nets, as the Lord found them doing when he called them to become fishers of men, Mark 1:16-20.

Small fishes, good to eat but not salable, were dried and furnished humble but wholesome food to the shepherd lads who tended the flocks on the hillsides. So when the multitude went out after the Lord and had nothing to eat, there was a lad there with "five barley loaves" (like biscuits with us) and "two small fishes" (John 6:9). And there where he fed the thousands, and all about this Sea of Galilee, as nowhere else on earth except at Nazareth, we are reminded on every side of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The Sea of Galilee is also variously called Lake Gennesaret, and Chinneroth (or Chinnereth). Josephus, the Jewish historian, calls it Gennesaritis, which seems to have been its designation at the beginning of the Christian era. It has also been called the Sea of Tiberias, from the city of that name on its western side, and the modern appellation is Bahr Tuburiyel. This whole region along the borders of the lake, though once densely populated, is now given over to "mournful and solitary silence." Writing of Tiberias (now to a great extent in ruins) John Carne, a well-known traveler said: "The house of the rich old Jew, where we lodged, perished with the rest in a recent earthquake. He came here from Aleppo and built this house, that he might die at the Lake of Galilee on the bosom of his beloved country. . . . The waters bathed the walls of the house, on whose terraced roof it was beautiful to walk at night and remember the hour when the Redeemer walked on the surface of the waves, through the storm and darkness, to save his disciples."

OUR FAMINE COMMISSIONER IN CHINA

OUR special correspondent in China, Mr. Francis H. Nichols, in his third letter, published below, gives a most entertaining account of the hospitalities and kindnesses extended to him as the representative of the Famine Fund, by imperial and provincial officials, at the various stopping-places on the route to Taiyuen-fu:

SINLO, PROVINCE OF CHILI, CHINA, Oct. 18.

However great may be the rigor of the famine in rought-stricken Shensi, a journey towards it demonstrates one thing, and that is the widespread attention which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's efforts for its relief have attracted among the Chinese. Prince Ching's expressions of gratitude find an echo in every Chinese official. As THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's representative, I am traveling to Singan as the guest of the Chinese Government. Notice of my coming has been telegraphed ahead to all the local magistrates along the route. At the end of every day's journey, I am to be received by the mandarin of the village and assigned to a house specially prepared to receive me. Carts and horses are provided for my use by the municipalities through which I pass, and it is all because THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave Americans a chance to "forgive their enemies" and lend a helping hand to poor, broken-hearted China.

The first hundred of the six hundred miles that lie between Peking and Singan are accomplished by rail to Paoting-fu. This is the road which will some day be extended to Canton, and will bring the towns of the Yangtse within three days of Peking. At present its embryo system is just beginning to recover from the partial destruction it received at the hands of the Boxers. A train for Paoting-fu leaves the Chen Men Gate daily.

Accompanied by a Chinese cook and a young, English-speaking Chinaman, whom I have engaged as interpreter, I bundled my provisions and belongings aboard two days ago and started southward. To American eyes, railroad trains in China are strangely and wonderfully made. Tickets are sold in the European method, as first, second and third class. The latter comprises the major part of the train and consists of ordinary open, flat cars, which do not differ in the least from those used for freight. There is scarcely any system of way bills or shipment. The company assumes little risk on anything or anybody which passes over its line. The only way to insure safe arrival of freight is to go with it yourself, and this the Chinese willingly do. Scores of them, some of them merchants of considerable wealth, sat in the open cars perched on piles of their belongings. But crude as the railroad is, it is the pride of Northern China, and that such is the case is one of the most hopeful signs that an awakening of the oldest civilization in the world has begun. The conservative element at the Imperial Court have bitterly opposed railroads for years, and the weight of public opinion was against them. It was urged that the smoke of the locomotives would interfere with the growing of crops along the route, and that the new way would drive to starvation hundreds of mule-drivers and junk-boatmen. But the result of the experiment has been so different tions there is a French agent of the company, who are building the road under lease from Hwang Ksu's government, but all the rest of the employees are Chinamen from locomotive engineers to brakemen.

After six hours of jolting and bumping and the shouting of orders in Chinese, the train halted in front of a gray brick station marked in both English and Chinese "Paoting-fu." By means of three carts and numerous questions of the interpreter, I finally succeeded in finding the residence of Rev. J. Walter Lowrie, of the Presbyterian Board of Missions, to whom I had a letter of introduction from Dr. Arthur Smith, head of the famine relief work. In a little "compound" I found him; a superb illustration of the sort of thing which a true missionary soldier of the Cross sometimes encounters in a heathen land. In a town of 35,000 Mr. Lowrie is at present the only English-speaking resident. The half dozen other foreigners are French engineers on the railway. A Princeton graduate and an extremely cultivated and charming man, Mr. Lowrie is leading a life of lonely self-sacrifice amid the scenes where his former friends and collaborators died for the faith. He has lived and labored in Paoting-fu for years, and by the merest chance was in Tientsin when the massacres occurred. For that reason he was the first selected to return and begin the work of gathering together the scattered fragments of native churches.

According to Western standards the brick and plaster walls of the Presbyterian Board Compound have within them few comforts; but the kindly, cheery reception given by Mr. Lowrie himself is enough to make the very rare American visitor forget that he is in China. We had just broken together a piece of the only American bread in Paoting-fu, when the big red and black card of Chou Fu, the lieutenant viceroy, was brought in. This marked the beginning of a reception and interview with Paoting-fu officials, which occupied nearly the entire afternoon. The court-yard was filled with sedan chairs, while Chinese soldiers presented arms at the door.

After Chou Fu came Hu Ku Tung, the highest city official, whose duties are sort of a composite of mayor and police magistrate. He, too, had a retinue of retainers and secretaries.

In every well-ordered Chinese house the tables are all placed against the wall. On either side of each table are two chairs or stools. Chinese "good form" demands that the guest sit at the left of the table, which is the from expectations that even Chinamen have come to see the absurdity of their arguments. They patronize it extensively, and are very fond of boasting that "you can now go a hundred miles in a day," as though it were something miraculous. At all the principal sta-

The World's Need

NOTHING is more certain than that Jehovah reigns among the nations. He can govern an empire as easily as he can govern an individual. It may be the Divine purpose to let the nations put their particular forms of government to full experiment, and then, when they have all failed in their experiment, that Christ in person will descend to rule the nations. It would not take him long to set up a perfect government, one suited to all lands and all people. In some morning or evening cloud he may descend. If so, blessed is that land which shall first greet him, and blessed that place where shall be set up the throne of his dominion. As he honored the Eastern hemisphere with his first coming, nineteen centuries ago, I wish that he might honor the Western hemisphere with his latter day coming. I do expect the Lord will come by the power of the Holy Ghost to transform, emancipate and save all nations.

Our world needs a radical fixing up. What a hard time it has had with earthquake and storm and conflagration and pestilence and war and iniquity of all sorts. It has suffered 6000 years of bombardment. The number of those who tried to make it worse has been larger than the number of those who tried to make it better, but the tides of better influence are coming in, the physical and moral disorders of the world are giving way, the men and women now coming on to take possession of the world are healthier as to their bodies and more ingenuous as to their minds and mightier as to their souls. The twentieth will be as far ahead of the nineteenth as the nineteenth is superior to the eighteenth. God did not build this world for a failure. From its capacity for improvement I conclude that it was constructed for some higher mission than it has yet executed. The human race must advance until there are no higher reaches of attainment.

And when the work is all done, as it will be, surely as God is strong enough to fulfil his promise, may it be found out that we have done something toward the consummation, if it be no more than to have spoken a cheering word to the disconsolate, or given a cup of cold water in the name of a disciple, or commended some sinful soul to the Christ who came to save sinners, even the chief.

The Conjunction of the Planets

AS many inquiries have been made concerning the extraordinary planetary conjunction of November and December—a spectacle which none now living can hope to see repeated—this journal communicated with Professor Young, of the Princeton Observatory, and with the Superintendent of the United States Naval Observatory, at Georgetown Heights, Washington, D. C., requesting their explanation of the celestial phenomenon. Professor Young's answer we have already published. The answer of Captain C. H. Davis, U. S. N., Superintendent of the Government Naval Observatory, just received, encloses a statement by Assistant Astronomer Theo. I. King, in charge of the 12-inch equatorial telescope at the Georgetown Heights Observatory. Astronomer King writes that the statements from the daily press, mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's letter of inquiry, are visually correct, as regards the unusual position of the planets of our solar system, viz., the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn on November 27, Venus and Mars being at nearly the same apparent place in the sky, with Uranus and Mercury not very far out of line. "As a matter of fact," Mr. King adds, "however, viewed from the centre of the sun (which is, of course, the approximate centre of revolution), Jupiter passed Saturn on the 27th of September, at which time Venus had nearly the same heliocentric longitude, and Mercury, Mars and Uranus were also nearly together, less than thirty degrees away; Neptune was then in the opposite part of his orbit, while the earth was at a point about half-way between the latter planet and the others. Although this apparent assemblage of so many planets in one part of the heavens is rare and optically beautiful, nevertheless, you perceive, doubtless, that if such unusual relations were portents of any kind, we would already have experienced the effects of the one above detailed, which is only one of the infinite combinations which these bodies can assume in relation to each other."

Thus, a spectacle which some may have regarded as portentous, becomes, to the mind of the student of the starry depths, a sublime illustration of the wondrous variety and infinite beauty that greet us everywhere in those celestial fields of light.

God of the rolling orbs above!
Thy name is written clearly bright
In the warm day's unvarying blaze,
Or evening's golden shower of light.
God of the world! the hour must come,
And nature's self to dust return;
Her crumbling altars must decay;
Her incense-fires shall cease to burn:
But still her grand and lovely scenes
Have made man's warmest praises flow:
For hearts grow holier as they trace
The beauty of the world below.

The Cold Season

ONE-HALF of the industries of our day are employed in battling inclemency of the weather. The furs of the North, the cotton of the South, the flax of our own fields, the wool of our own flocks, the coal from our own mines, the wood from our own forests, all employed in battling these inclemencies, and still every December, with blue lips and chattering teeth, answers: "None of us can stand before His cold." Now, this being such a cold world, God sends out influences to warm it. I am glad that the God of the frost is the God of the heat; that the God of the snow is the God of the white blossom; that the God of December is the God of June.

The question as to how we shall warm this world up is a question of immediate and all-encompassing practicality. In this zone and weather there are so many fireless hearths, so many broken window-panes, so many defective roofs that sift the snow. Coal and wood and flannels and thick coat are better for warming up such a place than tracts and Bibles and creeds. Kindle that fire where it has gone out. Wrap something around those shivering limbs. Shoe those bare feet. Hat that bare head. Coat that bare back. Sleeve that bare arm. Nearly all the pictures of Martha Washington represent her in courtly dress as bowed to by foreign ambassadors; but Mrs. Kirkland, in her interesting book, gives a more inspiring portrait of Martha Washington. She comes forth from her husband's hut in the encampment, the hut sixteen feet long by fourteen feet wide—she comes forth from that hut to nurse the sick, to sew the patched garments, to console the soldiers dying of the cold. That is a better picture of Martha Washington.

Hundreds of garments, hundreds of tons of coal, hundreds of glaziers at broken window-sashes, hundreds of whole-souled men and women, are necessary to warm this winter weather. What are we doing to alleviate the condition of those not so fortunate as we? Know ye not there are hundreds of thousands of people who cannot stand before His cold? It is useless to preach to bare feet, and to empty stomachs, and to gaunt visages. Christ gave the world a lesson in common sense when, before preaching the Gospel to the multitude in the wilderness, he gave them a good dinner.

Sign Your Name

I HAVE received an anonymous letter, so suggestive of good and profitable thought and asking a question in which we are all interested, that I write these lines.

Many anonymous letters are not worthy of thought.

In boyhood days we were impressed with the fertility of a certain author, whose name so often appeared in spelling books and readers, styled "Anon." He seemed to write more than Isaac Watts or Skakespeare or Blair. In the index, and scattered throughout all our books, was the name of "Anon." He appeared in all styles of poetry and prose and dialogue. We wondered where he lived, what his age was, and how he looked. It was not until quite late in boyhood that we learned that "Anon." was an abbreviation for anonymous, and that he was sometimes the best saint and at other times the most extraordinary villain.

After centuries of correspondence, "Anonymous" is as fertile of thought and brain and stratagem as ever, and will probably keep on writing till the last fire burns up his pen and cracks to pieces his ink-bottle. Anonymous letters sometimes have a mission of kindness and gratitude and good cheer. Genuine modesty may sometimes hide the name of an epistolary author or authoress. It may be a "God bless you" from someone who thinks herself hardly in a position to address you. It may be the discovery of a plot for your damage, which the revelator does not care to take the responsibility of a witness. It may be any one of a thousand things that mean frankness and delicacy, and honor and Christian principle. We have received anonymous letters which we have put away among our most sacred archive.

But we suppose most people chiefly associate the idea of anonymous communications with everything cowardly and base. There are in all neighborhoods perfidious and dastardly wretches, whose joy it is to write letters with fictitious signatures. Sometimes they take the shape of a valentine, the 14th of February being a great outlet for this vile spawn. Sometimes they take the form of a delicate threat that if you do not thus and so, there will be a funeral at your house, yourself the chief object of interest. Sometimes they will be denunciatory of your friends. Once being called to preside at a meeting for the relief of the sewing women of Philadelphia, and having been called in the opening speech to say something about their oppressors, we received some twenty anonymous letters, the purport of which was that it would be unsafe for us to go out of doors after dark. Three months after moving to Brooklyn, we preached a sermon reviewing one of the sins of the city, and anonymous letters came saying that we would not last six months in the City of Churches.

Let every young man know, that when he is tempted to pen anything which requires him to disguise his handwriting, he is in fearful danger. You despoil your own nature by such procedure more than you can damage anyone else. Bowie-knife and dagger are no more repulsive than an anonymous pen sharpened for defamation of character.

Cruelty to Animals

SOLOMON was the founder of the first society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, when he said, in Proverbs: "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." In other words, a man that abuses his horse or starves his cow, or beats his dog, or maltreats his cat, is no Christian. The God who heard the young ravens when they cried, will hear every cry of brutal distress. When the grasshoppers and the locusts assail our land, I do not know but they are the expression of God's vengeance against the wrongs done by man against the unintelligent creation, and that every gore of horn and every stroke of hoof are of similar meaning. Struck so often, is it a wonder that they strike back? I think we might take a suggestion of leniency toward all beasts, since they had prior possession of this world, and that man came in afterward. Fish and fowl were created on the fifth day. The cattle were created in the forenoon of the sixth day. Man was not created until in the afternoon of the sixth day. Certainly, the brute creation, first in possession of our world, ought to have a little regard from a race coming in after. In what light does this put the horrors of vivisection, or the mauling of living animals for the purpose of improving our knowledge of human physiology. In all parts of the earth, in the name of science, is this crime going on today, to-night. You have no more right to lacerate a living dog to find out what is best for a sick man, than you have to lacerate a living man for the benefit of a sick dog. Let this exploration be a post-mortem one, whether in the case of man or beast. Vivisection must, by the law of all Christians, be forbidden. Maltreatment of the brute, in some respects, is meaner than maltreatment of men, for men can make appeal against wrongs inflicted, but the brute can do nothing but suffer. We want another Professor Berghs to go forth, and defend the cause of that part of God's creation that cannot speak for itself.

Indians Bury the Hatchet

FROM a correspondent at Wichita, Kans., comes the story of a great celebration of Indians, recently held in the Kiowa camp, with the photographs reproduced on this page. He reports that the festival was one of extraordinary importance, from the Indian standpoint. It was occasioned by the close of a feud between the Cheyennes and the Kiowas, and was accompanied by the solemn burial of the hatchet. It appears that forty-seven years ago, the Cheyennes charged the Kiowas with stealing ponies and cattle. Real Bull, a Cheyenne Chief, collected his warriors, and attacked a camp of the Kiowas in the Wichita Mountains of the district we now know as Oklahoma. The camp was unprotected, and Real Bull and his followers did awful execution on the women and children. But later in the day the Kiowas were encountered, and there was a desperate fight, in which Real Bull and two hundred of his men were killed. From that time there has been a feud between the two tribes, and whenever parties of the one tribe met parties of the other there was sure to be trouble. But now peace has been concluded. The story of the cause of the feud, as related by a half-breed, is that the Cheyennes were recently attacked by an epidemic from which many died. One day while it was at its height, a Kiowa squaw, who had been ill-used and deserted by her husband, took refuge in the atmosphere sixteen days, and was almost dead. The ship's surgeon worked over him for hours, and then sent him to a hospital for treatment. With careful nursing, he recovered sufficiently to tell his story. He saw no opportunity in Germany for him to rise from the poverty to which he was born. He had heard much of the possibilities of getting on in America, but he could not get the thirty dollars to pay his fare. He then thought out the scheme of coming as freight. He had, however, no idea of what he would have to suffer. Several times in the darkness and foul air he was near dying in despair, and the rats were so numerous in the hold, and so fierce, that he had to fight for his life. It was an awful experience, and at the end he came near being sent back, as a stowaway. Happily for him, however, a broker who read his story, came to the conclusion that a man who would take such risks to get here would make a good American citizen, and he paid the expenses and gave a bond for him that he would not become a public charge within a year. Under these conditions the adventurous man will be allowed to stay. Strange, that while a man would brave so much to improve his temporal fortune, so few comparatively, accept the offer of eternal happiness, which is made to them freely through Christ.

The spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely (Rev. 22: 17).

A Church in Peril

The statement is made in an Ohio journal, that a church at Middletown is being gradually destroyed by a worm that burrows into the stone. It is a compara-to the naked eye. The mass is quite soft and friable and resembles in a general way the stones of Warrenton, Warren County, Mo., and Lance, France. The color is, however, darker than is the Warren County stone, and the chondritic structure more pronounced than in that of Lance. It is, moreover, uniformly gray in color, and not speckled with white, as is the last named. Under the microscope the stone is seen at once to belong to the chondritic type. Great interest is taken in Prof. Merrill's analysis, because of the possibility of its shedding light on the question of the materials of which the heavenly bodies are composed. Many study this question who unhappily neglect that other Celestial Visitant whose coming to this world brought salvation.

I am the living bread which came down from heaven (John 6: 51).

Rev. M. S. Rees, of Rochester, N. Y., has been holding evangelistic meetings at Wilkesbarre, Pa., in the Central Church, of which Dr. C. E. Mogg is pastor. At the end of the services the church received eighty-six persons on probation, and there are many others who have been deeply impressed.

Cheyenne camp. She was allowed to remain, and subsequently became the mother of a child, whose skin was white. The Cheyennes regarded the occurrence as an augury of good. The epidemic suddenly ceased, and the child, whose birth was coincident with the happy change, was named the White Dove. The hearts of the Cheyennes softened toward the Kiowas, and a chief was sent to them to tell them the story and present them with forty ponies. Friendly pow-wows followed, and finally the peace festival which has just taken place was arranged. At its climax, after feasting and dancing and quaint ceremonies, Young Real Bull, the son of the chief whom the Kiowas killed nearly half a century ago, bent his head to receive from the Kiowa chief Medicine Bow the blessing of the Kiowa Manitou, which has never before been invoked on any man outside the Kiowa tribe. Then, with an exchange of presents, the Cheyennes set out for their own reservation. Whether the story of the White Dove is apochryphal or not, it is certain that the long feud is ended, and no more will the two tribes regard one another as enemies. Would that all the nations of the world might similarly end their feuds! That most desirable consummation will surely come, and when it does, men will date back the influences that have brought it about to the birth of a Child.

Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder, and his name shall be called . . . the Prince of Peace (Isa. 9: 6).

A Voyage in a Box

There was great excitement at the dock at Hoboken, N. J., last week, when the Hamburg liner, Palatia, was loaded. A stevedore going down into the hold of the vessel to bring up the freight, was startled to hear a faint voice begging for water. It came from a man who had made the voyage from Hamburg in a large packing-case. He had provisioned the box with food and coffee, had crawled into it, and had been sent in it as freight to New York. He had been in that stifling tively new edifice and is one of the finest in the city. The tower and the walls, especially those exposed to the sun, have become unsightly of late by reason of the number of holes bored into the stone. They are the work of a sort of beetle that is common in the sandstone region, but has never been troublesome in that section before. The beetles are black, about an inch and a half long, and have powerful mandibles, with which they easily cut their way into the soft stone. They are very strong for their size. Their mandibles are about one-quarter of an inch long and are as hard as ivory. We may hope that, though their edifice is suffering, the members of the church have not been afflicted. God's children are protected from the doom that the prophet denounced against the wicked.

The moth shall eat them up as a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool (Isa. 51: 8).

The Analysis of a Meteor

A remarkable aërolite which fell near Felix, Perry Co., Ala., has been submitted for analysis to Prof. George P. Merrill, Curator of the Department of Geology at the National Museum of Washington, D. C. The stone was broken by its fall into five pieces, which weighed altogether 2,049 grams. It is about thirteen centimetres in its greatest length by nine in breadth, and about the same thickness, and was covered, except where broken, by a very thin black crust, nowhere more than half a millimetre in thickness. The color on the broken surfaces is dark smoky gray, almost black. It is very fine-grained, with numerous small dark chondrules, not more than one or two millimetres in diameter at most, and with no metallic iron visible INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSON FOR DEC. 29, 1901.

GOLDEN TEXT—Romans. 8: 31:

IF GOD BE FOR US, WHO CAN BE AGAINST US?

THE geography of the quarter's lessons—of the year as well—is all included in three historic countries, Mesopotamia, whence came Abraham, the father of the Jewish nation; Canaan, to which God sent him, and Egypt, to which he went in one unfortunate instance. Joseph and Moses had to do with Canaan and Egypt only. The temperance lesson takes us from Canaan back to Mesopotamia, the land of captivity to which the Jews were carried, in part, because of intemperance. The Christmas lesson reverses this order, the magi coming from Mesopotamia to Canaan, whence Jesus was carried into Egypt, to be soon brought back to Canaan, then called Palestine, which has become the "Holy Land" because nearly all the earthly life of Christ was spent there.

Four persons should be kept in mind in reviewing the last quarter—God, Joseph, Moses, myself. As we recall the most important facts in the wonderful biographies of Joseph and Moses, let us, as Moses did, "see the Invisible" back of all the great deeds and words, remembering how Joseph said, "It is not in me; God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace," and how Moses and Miriam sang at the culmination of the miracles of deliverance, on the far side of the Red Sea, "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously." But let us also keep ourselves in mind, and ask in each story given us for an example, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" It has been well said that "ours is a pronoun religion," and the first pronouns to which we are to give attention are the divine "thou," and the human "me." After our own souls are converted and commissioned, "we" should be oftener on our lips, in a Joseph-like, Moses-like, God-like concern for our people and all people, that they may also see and serve God.

We hear much of "Moses' choice" in commendation of his refusal of high office; but there are those who need to be reminded that Joseph's choice, to accept office as opportunity for larger usefulness, was equally noble, and was also made "as seeing Him who is invisible."

Joseph and Moses, with all the contrasts in their careers, were alike in one particular, the full-orbed sun, by which God pictured Joseph to himself, and the burning bush, in which God pictured Moses to himself, each representing a man aflame with the presence of God. That is the one essential thing, to be filled with God, and then we can serve him alike as shepherd or sovereign, in prison or palace, in childhood or age.

A child prepares himself to resist such great temptations as Joseph resisted, temptations to impurity, to despondence, to revenge, by resisting the little temptations of early life. A lady, while giving the finishing touches to a table spread for a dinner-party, heard the patter of naked feet upon the stairs. She then hid herself behind the window curtains. The child, in her night-dress, came into the room, climbed upon a chair, helped herself deliberately to a fine peach, and went off. The mother felt very sad, and began to consider what to do. Presently she heard the same patter of feet. The child clambered into the chair, replaced the fruit, triumphantly ejaculating, "That's one for you, Mr. Devil!" and trotted off to bed.

WHAT WAS JOSEPH'S GREATEST, NOBLEST ACT?

Not the storing of the grain, for in that he wronged the people, in one particular, perhaps unwittingly, perhaps by obeying an unjust order of his superior officer, as so many to-day do what they know to be wrong, if ordered by a master to do it, forgetting that "everyone shall give an account of himself to God," and should always "obey God rather than man." Surely, we must all admit that Joseph's greatness was shown most fully in what we significantly call his "magnanimity," his forgiveness of a great wrong, a victory that most of us know by our own failure to win it, is greater than taking a city. That quality in others, however, we instinctively admire, for example, in Lincoln and Grant, whose magnanimity to a defeated foe is lauded by North and South alike. At the close of the Civil War, Col. John S. Mosby was exempted from the amnesty that was extended to most of those who had been in the Southern army. But as he was a dangerous man he was not arrested. There was always danger in the air, however, and his wife lived on a high tension of apprehension all the time. One day she announced her intention of going to Washington to see General Grant. The proud and high-strung old war-horse declared that she should not. He repeated his determination to ask no favors of the Government. But Mrs. Mosby was made out of the same stern stuff as her husband. She was resolute. Quietly she was driven to the station, and she went to Washington, where she was promptly given an audience with General Grant. He received her with marked courtesy, and spoke of her husband in generous terms such as one brave man so naturally uses toward another. He heard her pathetic story, and immediately issued a general order extending to Colonel Mosby the benefits of the amnesty. He went further, and asked if there was anything more he could do. When she returned home, and informed her husband of what she had done, and detailed to him the gentle and courteous manner in which she had been received, the old warrior's heart melted with gratitude. He went to Washington in person, and thanked General Grant. From that day forward they were fast friends. And Colonel Mosby was also won to the support of the policies of General Grant, to which he had been bitterly opposed. So, by such a forgiving spirit as is beautifully pictured in Joseph, we may not only make friends of former foes, but win them also to the cause of Christ, to be his friends as well, who is a yet nobler exemplar of forgiveness, as he prays as the nails were being driven through his quivering hands and feet, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." An unselfish heart thinks less of the wrongs he himself suffers than of the harm which the wrong-doers are doing themselves by their sins. The generous heart even seeks for some palliating explanation. "They know not what they do." There are few more important warnings in the quarter than this, from the self-conquest of Joseph: God will not dwell in the same heart with a grudge. Jesus said: "If ye forgive not men their trespasses neither will your father in heaven forgive you."

IN MOSES' LIFE, WHAT WAS THE GREATEST PERSONAL ACT, AND WHAT THE GREATEST PUBLIC ONE?

Surely, his choice to "suffer affliction with the people of God," with an eternity of coronation beyond, rather than to "enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season" in Egypt's palace, where he must stand for idolatries which he knew were a delusion. If he had chosen otherwise, besides losing heaven, and earth's best treasure, self-respect, he would have lost also the world's esteem, and might have been that mummy of a

THE NEW-BORN DELIVERER

Pharaoh that Maspero, of the Boulak Museum, took through an Egyptian custom-house, and, to hide it in time of war marked it "dried fish."

In the light of eternity, there is nothing so well worth while as serving God. In what amazing trifles many a man as learned as Moses wastes his powers! A German professor, probably a lineal descendant of the erudite grammarians who, upon his deathbed, expressed his profound regret that he had not devoted his entire life to the study of the date case alone, is said to have determined the exact duration of an average wink. He declares that it takes four-tenths of a second. Of course, the learned scientist made use of special apparatus constructed by himself, and devoted much time to arduous experiments. Better far had he used his education to make others ponder the "duration" of eternity, whose issues may be settled for good or ill by a choice made in the twinkling of an eye.

Moses' greatest public act—God's act through him—was the bringing of Israel out from Egyptian bondage, and the chief scene in all the miracles of deliverance was the Passover, a double picture of judgment and atonement. The thing that Egypt had taken for gods were turned into plagues, as to-day whatever we put in place of God, wealth or selfish pleasure, or ambition becomes a curse. An Egyptian inscription records the sudden death of Meneptah's first-born, one of many confirmations of the Bible's minut accuracy. Pharaoh lacked an essential element of real greatness in being unwilling to admit his mistakes and change his course accordingly. A learned man has said that the hardest words to pronounce in the English language are, "I have made a mistake." When Frederick the Great wrote to the Senate, "I have just lost a battle it is my own fault," Goldsmith says, "His confession shows more greatness than his victories." From the time of Pharaoh's overthrow at the Red Sea, in consequence of his persistent fighting against God, seeking to hold as property what God bade him give up, the power of Egypt declined, and its sway was never so great again. What a death, whether in the sea or elsewhere that Pharaoh must have died if he had time for remorse! A visitor in a hospital found a young man near death. "Can I do anything for you?" he inquired, as he bent over the cot. "O, sir," cried the young man, "can you undo?" In answer to a kindly word, he opened his heart, and unburdened his soul to the visitor. He told how he had led this companion and that one astray how he had ruined this pure life and that one. "O sir, can you undo this awful work that I have done? Can God undo it?"

On the side of the Israelites, the Passover was a home feast of mercy and thanksgiving. They were to be delivered from external bondage, but the slain lamb reminded them of a deeper deliverance from sin, which they needed yet more. We have abundant evidence that it was not because of any sinlessness on their part, but of God's grace, that they were redeemed.

On this last Sabbath of the year, when its sorrows as well as its joys are recalled, we should not forget the divine meaning of the Passover's "bitter herbs." As the herbs, though bitter, were wholesome food, that strengthened the body, so God would have us recognize that there is blessing for the soul in "the bread of tears." One of the latest inventions is a process by which the bitter horse chestnuts are to be made into sweet food. The meat is dried and powdered, the bitter element is extracted, and a sweet flour remains, richer even than peas and beans. Incidentally, this reminds us, by way of reviewing the temperance lesson, that alcohol's usual course is not to take out, but introduce the bitter. But this transformation of bitter into sweet also illustrates the fact that God—sometimes by permitting evil to work and overruling it for good—can turn bitterness into bread, sorrow into strength. A shopkeeper's wife in China said to an old lady who was looking very sad, "If you want comfort, go to the Christians, they have a doctrine that comforts people." The newspapers report that "the man with a musical heart is dead." His heart-throb moved in musical rhythm, like a harp uttering a song. In a spiritual sense every heart, though it "knows its own bitterness," should beat in constant songs of thanksgiving, because God comforts in sorrow and overrules it to our good and the good of others. "Yet Sing" is the suggestive name of a Chinaman. Whatever comes, "yet sing," because God reigns. But for all of us, the most immediate lesson in this quarter is that God, who called Moses, calls every one of us.

A land afflicted with plagues because of sin. That describes Egypt. Is there any modern land to which it also applies in some degree? Indeed, is there any to which it does not?

Points and Questions One who abused his office. That means Pharaoh. But have not we, in this land and age when almost everybody lightly accepts some office, abused these trusts and opportunities by neglect if not misuse?

God's fearless ambassador. Such was Moses. Are we such, also?

One who held on to what God bade him let go. Pharaoh did that to his own destruction. Is there not some person or thing from which God has bidden us separate to which we are rebelliously clinging?

"The wages of sin is death"—for both worlds. Are we hardening our hearts by persistent refusals to obey God, and so dying before we die?

God is the Supreme Judge, the King of kings. Are we living so that this thought is not a terror, but a tower of defense, from which we hide in the fear of man?

Coming Christmas Joys

DIFFERENT from every other joy, in its purity, its universality, its perfection, is the joy that Christmas brings. Once a year, everybody, old, young, rich, poor, wayfarer, home-keeper, lover, friend, toiler, king on the throne, peasant in the hut, sailor on the sea, everybody tastes again a draught from the sweet cup of childhood.

When Christmas comes, whatever our circumstances, we go back for a little time to the simplicity and the impulsiveness of children's pleasure, to the faith of the children, and to their acceptance of the day, without thought of the future.

Our Lord came as a child. Once, he lay in a stable, and a mother bent above him, in the ecstasy mothers feel when they clasp their first-born. But he comes again, every year, as a Child. He was born again, oh! strange, sweet mystery, in every heart that loves him. And wherever there is a little child in the world, there may be a sweet thought of the Child, who brought Heaven's love and pardon to this old earth of ours.

Christmas Gifts to Men

Women and children like so many things that it is easy to choose their Christmas presents; but often a man's gifts seem to lack the personal element. If a man cares for books, the case is simplified. A subscription to an excellent religious and family periodical is always an appreciated gift, even though the man share it with the family. If it be his, he has the first reading of it as a matter of course.

There are little conveniences in leather and silver, which may be carried in the pocket, as a calendar, a shaving-brush case, a pair of scissors, or a nail-file, which any man will enjoy. A pocket diary is liked by the methodical man who keeps a daily memorandum of events and incidents. Plan carefully for father's Christmas gift. Father is a big boy at heart, he works hard, and should have a merry Christmas, if you can manage it for him.

The Christmas Markets

One realizes in a stroll through the markets of a great city like New York, how many people there are to be fed. From a multitude of hamlets and villages, by steamer and train, from places hundreds and thousands of miles apart, the food of the city comes. Turkeys, chickens, beef, mutton, ducks, geese, pork, game. There seems literally no end to the wares offered on the stalls; and no end to the fish, the oysters, the lobsters, the sea-food invitingly spread. Then, the mountains of vegetables, the stacks of celery, the vast pyramids of fruit, the long aisles rimmed on either side by butter and cheese, the immense variety of tinned goods, the attractive relishes and sauces and piquant pickles and preserves, all combine to give an impression of our great wealth as a nation and of God's wonderful bounty. We walk through the Christmas markets and we say, "Verily, O Father, thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing."

Christmas, on a Journey

One severe December, it came to pass that a very gentle and timid lady was traveling to see a sister who lived at the other side of this vast continent. All went well for four days, then the train ran straight into a blizzard. Blinding snow-drifts piled so high that the snow-plough could not dislodge them, nor the storm-engine clearing the way ahead, break a path. The train stalled; bitter cold outside, and not a thing to see from the windows, veiled and hidden as they were by the snow.

Miss Miriam Day had had many and strange experiences in her life, but none that required so much faith and patience as this. Six hours off, a sister's house and a sister's welcome. Luxurious rooms, a fire, a bath, a broad soft bed, and the riotous greetings of nephews and nieces. And here she was, without one she knew, caught in the toils of a wintry tempest, solitary on a snow-bound train.

Of course Miss Miriam felt blue, but she had not spent forty years in accepting the weather as part of God's will, without learning that the very best recipe for curing misery is to seek for somebody more miserable still, and give him or her some help.

She looked around more curiously and earnestly than she had hitherto done, and she found the next neighbor, a young girl, fifteen or so, with dark hair and eyes, and a childishly sweet face, who was forlornly sitting by herself, with big tears slowly chasing each other down her cheeks. Miss Miriam looked again and saw that this child was traveling under the care of the Express Company, and was tagged to the same place to which she was herself bound.

you the whole winter, so you'll have one friend in the new country."

The hours slipped by. Miss Miriam gently drew the talk to the Friend who never fails us, and when it was time to go to sleep, it was a very happy girl who closed her eyes, believing in Jesus and his love. In the night the train moved on. In the morning, late, but safe, the two travelers, who had become friends, were at their desired haven.

Holly, Pine and Fir

When the snows are thick on the ground, and the garden plants are all hidden and covered up, and we have said farewell to our roses till next summer, we appreciate the beauty of the evergreen trees. How strong they are, how spicy their aroma, how deep their tint, how resinous and balmy and crisp and cheery they are, these trees that are to be loaded with Christmas gifts and lighted with tapers, and brought into our homes, to be the centres of cheer and gladness.

On the Christmas dinner-table, a miniature tree, just a baby tree, if you please, with broad red ribbons extending from it to the corners of the table, and narrow ribbons to every place, and a present at every plate. In the invalid's room, on the small round table near her hand, a little tree, with its message from the wholesome, breezy world outdoors, its look and its breath of the woods, its dainty burden of gifts meant for her delight. In the crowded city flat, a small tree, with its meanings of Christmas pleasure; small friends, but real, if you please. Away with imitation trees in the yule-tide. I have seen them, impertinent things, much like the original, but pinchbeck after all, kept packed in trunks with Christmas tinsel and trappings from year to year. Burn it up, if you have one, and procure a living tree. And in the big house, the country house, the house on the old farm, or in the old village, have a great tall Christmas tree, and if there are not children enough, ask the friends and neighbors in to share the festival.

Christmas wreaths in the windows, please; mistletoe in the parlor, for the young folks to happen under, for the true lover's troth-plight, and timid kiss; garlands in the churches, and great pleasure in making and putting them up, and everywhere, this year of grace, as it slips away from us, holly, cedar, pine and fir.

And as we twine the evergreens, let us recall the happy days we have had in the past, oh, so many of them, and let us look forward to a great many more in the future. And, too, let us ignore slights, if there have been any, forget feuds, forgive injuries, cherish no grudges, cultivate all loves, and come nearer than ever to our God, in the Christmas-tide of peace and gladness. Let us hear the angels sing:

Still through the midnight skies they come,
With peaceful wings unfurled,
And still celestial music floats,
O'er all the weary world.

Charmed With the Art Portfolio

R. D. A., Columbus, O., writes: "I am charmed and delighted with the pictures, and only sorry because I cannot have them all mounted and put into frames or passee partout at once. Why, this Portfolio is worth ever so much more than I paid for the paper alone, and I have the paper besides."

MOTHER'S LITTLE SWEETHEART

We'll be so happy, baby! mother's sweetheart, dear,
Who is finding out that Christmas is coming this bright year.

In a friendly fashion, she went over to the young girl, and offered her some biscuits from her bag. Miss Miriam never traveled without a supply of biscuits, hard-boiled eggs and chocolates. "One never knows what she may need," she was wont to observe. The dainty food was grateful to the child, who was hungry, and the companionship was more welcome still.

Miss Miriam soon found out about her. An orphan, coming from England, to an aunt in the far West; a stranger in a strange land. A child who felt more than usually desolate, because it was so near Christmas and she expected no Christmas mirth. She was not even sure that her aunt wanted her, and she was very heavy-hearted.

Miss Miriam cheered her, told her stories, promised to go with her to find her aunt, if that lady was not waiting at the station. She said too, "I'll be close by

CROWDS AT THE OLD BOWERY MISSION SERVICES — REMARKABLE INSTANCES OF RESCUED SOCIAL WRECKS AND WANDERERS LED TO THE CROSS

WHEN the lease of the old Bowery Mission was about to expire last spring, the announcement that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would again renew it was received with a feeling of profound thankfulness by all the friends of this good work for souls. It was a case of history repeating itself, for, as readers of this paper know, the Mission would have gone out of existence on the death of its founder some years ago had not THE CHRISTIAN HERALD assumed the burden of its support.

Next came the pleasant news that the building was to be put in thorough repair; and to be painted and decorated in a manner worthy of the famous old temple. This evidence of renewed and deepened interest in the welfare of the only place of worship on one of the busiest and wickedest thoroughfares of one of the mightiest cities in Christendom was hailed with great joy by many Christian workers who know its need and worth; and by thousands of homeless men who look upon it as their cathedral. After the Mission had been in the hands of the painters and plasterers and carpenters for ten weeks this summer, a great crowd awaited the opening of the doors on Sept. 22. The formal reopening had been fixed for the Sunday previous, but on that day, the first Sabbath after our President's martyrdom, a quiet memorial service was held instead. We had a meeting each evening thereafter, and on the day of the funeral conducted a largely-attended and most impressive service; but our rejoicings were postponed. We are thankful for those meetings of that week of sorrow. Probably never since the Mission began have there been more interesting cases of conversion than during that time, in which the nation's heart was so deeply stirred and all men's hearts were serious and sad.

In surged the great crowd on our Sunday of celebration, as soon as the doors were opened. One of the first to arrive was a well dressed man, wearing an army button and medals, but, alas, under the influence of liquor. Soon after the meeting commenced he sent a written slip to the platform:—"Will you sing 'Nearer My God to Thee?' I was in McKinley's regiment—Lieut. A." Then a little later came another request. "Sing my mother's favorite hymn 'Come Thou Fount of Every Blessing.' I have not heard it in thirty-five years." Both requests were complied with, and under the singing of the latter hymn the poor fellow broke down completely, and came and knelt at the front of the platform, where he remained whilst we prayed earnestly for him.

Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the "Mother of the Bowery Boys," was in formal charge of the meeting, an exceedingly appropriate arrangement. It was touching to witness her genuine delight at having her "boys" once more in what she termed her family gathering; and there was genuine pathos in the way this feeling was responded to by the men. Professor Benke, one of the Mission's most notable and most steadfast converts, presided at the newly-tuned organ; and the male quartette, composed of Mr. Benke and three other converts, rendered noble service in vocal music.

I wish that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD could have seen the proud glances which that congregation directed to the newly-painted walls, and the new stained-glass windows; how eagerly they

Then came some wonderful testimonies. The first was from an old man, seventy-five years of age, who, entering the Mission six months ago, found peace for his soul. He was quickly followed by a young man, one of the converts of the week, who, with unmistakable earnestness, declared his gratitude for this, the first sober Sunday he had spent for seven years.

Two respectably dressed gentlemen sitting on the platform testified to having found Christ in the early summer, in the face of terrible temptation; they had held on faithfully. Next spoke the redoubtable old Irish sailor, "Captain" Monahan, now nearing eighty, who was converted in the Bowery Mission seven years ago. A wonderful testimony his! Two young and power. The story of his own rescue from a drunkard's life and death is one of thrilling interest. On Sunday evening this story was told while he spoke from the text "Believe ye that I am able to do this?" After the service and testimonies twenty men were found kneeling at the penitential altar.

During the few weeks that have elapsed since the Mission reopened the crowds have been very large, and many interesting events have occurred. The Sunday evening meetings have been a special feature of interest, the addresses being given alternately by Dr. George Dowkontt, an old friend of the Mission, and Mr. Thomas S. Gladding. Several of the boys have also celebrated their "Anniversaries."

At the Boys' Thanksgiving Dinner, Dr. Klopsch delivered a short but interesting address, which greatly encouraged the young men present. They appeared almost startled by his statement that "in all probability some of you boys will become millionaires," and, seeing their incredulity, he very adroitly instanced the cases of Andrew Jackson and Vice-President Wilson, and at the close of his address the boys evidently did not feel it to be such an impossible thing after all. Then there came a very tender tribute to the value of Mrs. Bird's work amongst the boys, and a reference to the Great Thanksgiving Day, at which he trusted they would all be present to rejoice over battles fought and victories won.

Christian people interested in the evangelization of our cities, and appreciating the need and value of the work done at the Old Bowery Mission (the only place of worship on one of the world's most noted highways), and who wish to aid in the continuation and enlargement of that work, can help the institution by sending contributions for that purpose to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through whose columns acknowledgment will be made. The cost of keeping this huge work going is great; and but for the aid of generous friends the good work that has been done could not have been accomplished. Help the homeless "wanderers of the night," to whom the Bowery Mission is the only beacon of hope and safety!

read the dear old Scripture texts that now stand out in such forceful beauty. There were many grateful words about THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's generosity, which had made this place so attractive for way-faring worshippers and homeless sinners. The exercises were, of course, exceedingly simple.

Mrs. Bird called upon the Superintendent and Mr. T. S. Gladding to offer dedicatory prayers; Mrs. Hallimond sang as a solo Spohr's "As pants the hart"; the Superintendent read the eighty-fourth psalm, "How amiable are thy tabernacles," and spoke of having recently visited some of the great English cathedrals and finding nowhere truer worship or more uplifting influences than in the Bowery Mission. He spoke also of the providential founding of the Mission, and equally of the providential way in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD became connected with it. He pointed out the pledge of undiminished interest in the work, on the part of the paper and its readers, as shown in the beautified and restored building, and then asked the men to pray earnestly that Dr. Klopsch might find means for carrying out his plans for making the Bowery Mission a permanent institution of the city.

men, mere boys, well educated, told of their arrival in the city, after a long tramp, only a few nights ago, of being directed while wandering in one of the city parks to the Mission; of how they came and found help and sympathy, and, above all, salvation for their souls. There were so many testimonies to be given, proving the work of grace done in the grand old Mission, that at three o'clock (and the doors had been opened at eleven) the meeting was adjourned to the evening.

Again an immense crowd assembled, and many hundreds had to be turned away for lack of room. The address of the evening was given by Mr. Charles H. Sandford, Superintendent of the Riverside Mission, Dover, N. J. Mr. Sandford is a convert of the Bowery Mission. When, chiefly through the efforts of Mr. James S. Stearns, of Morristown, N. J., a gentleman who has many such good deeds placed to his credit, the opening of the Dover Mission was decided upon six months ago, the Superintendent of the Bowery Mission was asked to recommend someone to take charge of it, and Mr. Sandford was named. Great success has attended his efforts in the New Jersey town. He is a speaker of remarkable pathos

ANSWERED PRAYERS

A Mother, Prescott, Wash., writes:

I was in trouble, and asked my Heavenly Father to help me and spare me from a great sorrow, which I feared would come upon me. I was helped; and instead of the trouble, a great blessing has come. When I was praying so earnestly for help, I saw the "Answered Prayers" in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; and no one but God knows how I was strengthened in faith by reading them.

E. G. A., Virgil, Kans., writes:

I am deeply interested in this department. God works many times by human agencies. He opens doors that would not of themselves open to us; but in doing this he is pleased to employ his servants. The answer to our prayer comes by natural means; and so we after receiving, often fail to recognize his hand. In especial times of trial and in bereavement he helps us bear our burdens; and heals our wounds. God's healing leaves no scars.

Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,
The Christian's native air.

Framed her Pictures at Once

Mrs. C. S. F., Woodfords, Me., writes: "I said to my daughter, who is a dear lover of art and beauty, 'Now, May, you take your choice of six of them.' She selected six, and in less than an hour she had made arrangements to have them mounted and framed. They look very fine."

The Needle's Eye

BY FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

A NEW SERIAL STORY WRITTEN EXPRESSLY

Chapter IV.—A Squaring of Accounts

“E wants you should help him out to the barn, honey,” said Elizabeth. “That’s why I cut yer hair; big boys don’t want no curls, do they?”

The child looked soberly at the long, bright tresses which hung from Elizabeth’s trembling fingers. He shook his head, his dark eyes sparkling. “I’m glad I’m big,” he said, squaring his small shoulders. “I like to help!”

Twenty times during the morning did Elizabeth strain eyes and ears for some token that all was well with her darling. “I s’pose she’s with him,” she sighed, while a hot tear dropped on the potato she was peeling. “But I dunno what in creation she c’d do fer him ef ’Rastus gits mad. He’s allers awful ha’sh with colts when he breaks ’em to harness; I remember one time he killed a steer ’at wouldn’t turn into the yard jest when he wanted it to. Land! I can’t stan’ it another minute nohow; I mus’ see what he’s doin’!”

The barn was empty, but a heap of corn-cobs and a measure of shelled corn revealed the initial task. “With his baby fingers!” muttered Elizabeth, shaking with indignation; “they’ll be fairly raw! Well, I kin do that, an’ I will after this.”

She crept cautiously up into the loft and looked away across the fields. “’Rastus ’ll be plantin’ fodder corn this mornin’, I reckon,” she whispered, then caught her breath in a quick sob. “Yes, I kin see him—in his little pink aporn! ’Rastus is makin’ him drop corn. The sun’s turrible hot, an’ he ain’t used to it neither. Oh, Lord—Lord!”

At noon time the small head drooped wearily over the full plate. “I don’t feel hungry—very,” said the child, smiling bravely into Elizabeth’s anxious face; “but I guess I helped a lot!”

“You’re a dummed sight more trouble ’an you’re wuth, that’s what you be,” observed Winch, as he shoved back from the table. “You’ll hev to do better ’n ye did this forenoon, or I’ll try what lickin’ ’ll do.” With that he lighted his pipe and strode out toward the barn. To Elizabeth’s immense relief, she presently saw him drive away toward the village.

“I guess you’d better lay down on the lounge an’ rest a spell,” she said to Immanuel. “It’s nice an’ cool in the settin’ room. Come, honey, I’ll bake you a big cookie with currants in bimeby.”

The child slipped off his chair with a sigh; his eyes wandered wistfully to the open door.

“Would you drather go out, ’Manuel?” asked Elizabeth, tenderly. “It’s pretty hot in the sun, but I guess there’s some strawb’ris gettin’ ripe down by the brook where it’s shady.”

She watched the little cropped head as it bobbed in and out amid the lush tangle of greenery which overhung the roadway. An oriole called softly to its mate from the top of the tall elm, which held its swinging cradle; a bumble-bee yellow with pollen boomed past in the sunshine; crowds of bright-faced flowers and tasseled grasses wagged their young heads in the warm breeze. Elizabeth heard nothing—saw nothing of it all. She turned back to her kitchen and fell to scraping an iron kettle with feverish energy. “Oh, Lord—Lord!” she groaned, to the discordant accompaniment of the broken knife, “I’m awful ’fraid of what’s comin’!”

Immanuel trotted soberly along the dusty road till he came to the brook, which lay across the fields like a twisted ribbon, touched here and there with a glint of silver, where its busy ripples caught the blaze of the sun. The child slipped down the steep bank into the jubilant life of the meadow. A warm, sweet smell of wild strawberries, blept with a thousand subtler fragrances of unfold-buds and full-blown, passionate flowers, greeted him like a kindly presence. He stretched his small, tired body on the soft earth with a deep sigh of content, all the vague unhappiness of the morning falling away from his spirit like a torn garment. Thousands of fluttering leaves shot through with emerald splendor spread a cool shelter above his head; peace sang in the low gurgle of the stream and breathed in the caressing wind. The child listened drowsily, and presently the sound of the brook carried him away into a dream full of comfort.

So Elizabeth found him. “Poor lamb!” she sighed, and awakened him to the sight of a big ginger-bread man, plentifully besprinkled with currants.

At six o’clock of a summer’s morning a corn-field is a place of enchantment, even if one be encumbered with a big hoe, the handle of which is higher than one’s head. The long arching aisles are full of gleaming lights, where the sun strikes through the blue-green leaves; the wind urges them to mysterious whisperings. Crowds of yellow butterflies—those innocent lovers of of skill and strength, which the child regarded with honest admiration. He glanced down at his own small person, righteous ambition swelling in his soul. “I am growing,” he said to himself, “and I am learning—every day, munny says so!” Many times during the past weeks he had sobbed himself to sleep; but always the morning brought the white page of a new day.

Erastus Winch had also paused to mop his wet forehead and ease his aching back; during this period of respite he fixed his savage eyes on the small toiling figure in the adjoining furrow. In another instant his heavy hand descended with crushing force on the delicate shoulders. “Ye tarnal fool!” he shouted, his face purple with rage. “I seen yer! ye need n’t try to lie out of it—ye doggoned beggar brat! A-pullin’ off the tops of the weeds an’ hidin’ ’em—I seen yer!”

There is no spectacle on earth more revolting than that of helpless childhood cowering beneath the brute strength God has set for its defense. Woe is decreed for the man who thus offends one of the little ones. Aye, let a millstone be hanged about his neck and let him be drowned in the depths of the sea; it were better for him! There was no visible presence in the corn-field; no hand appeared to stay the threatened blows, yet on a sudden Erastus Winch stopped short in his torrent of abuse and stared open-mouthed to the right and left.

“I am sorry,” faltered the child. “I didn’t know the weeds would grow again. I’ll dig up all the roots. I’m sorry I didn’t know.”

“Wall, you ’ll be a durned sight sorrier than you be now, time I git through with ye!” growled the man. “Now you dig them weeds, roots an’ all; I’ll see ’at you don’t never forgit ’bout it agin, when I git ye up to the barn!”

“You’ll be needin’ some help for harvestin’ this week, wont you, ’Rastus?” asked Elizabeth, as she set a platter of steaming beef and vegetables before her husband at noon. “Billy Giddings was here this mornin’; he’s lookin’ fur a job. I tol’ him—”

“I seen him,” interrupted Winch, spearing a potato with an iron fork. “He’s comin’ tomorrer at sun up.”

Elizabeth involuntarily glanced at Immanuel, who was washing his hands at the back door.

“We’re goin’ to tackle the ten acre lot first,” pursued Winch. “The boy thar c’n take a holt of the pertaters, ef he ain’t too lame come tomorrer.”

Elizabeth turned her face aside to conceal the look of satisfaction that crept over it. She could hoe potatoes, and the field was well out of sight of the ten acre lot. “Come in to dinner, honey,” she said to the child; “I’ve got some nice cherry pie.”

“You ain’t got none fer him,” said Winch, speaking thickly through a big mouthful. “That young feller’s a-goin’ to git his belly full o’ somethin’ ’sides pie, ’s quick’s I git through eatin’.”

Elizabeth gripped the back of her chair. “What’s he done to anger ye, ’Rastus?” she faltered. “He—he’s nothin’ but a child, husban’. You forgit ’at he’s only—”

“I don’t fergit nothin’, Mis’ Winch; I ain’t the fergitin’ kin’. Fetch on yer pie, will ye; I ain’t got no time to fool away.”

Elizabeth turned blindly. “Here’s the pie, ’Rastus,” she said huskily. Then she walked to the door with sudden determination. “’Manuel,” she said in a low voice, “don’t ye want to go down to the spring an’ fetch munny a pitcher of nice, cool drinkin’ water; there ain’t a drop in the house.”

Winch dropped his knife and fork with a clatter. “You’re a-lyin’!” he burst out. “Yer bucket’s full, an’ ye know it. Durn ye! you c’n come back here; I’ll ten’ to yer case now!” The last words were addressed to Immanuel, who, with ready obedience, had started for the spring. “Munny!” cried the child, his eyes wide with terror. “Come on!” shouted Winch, seizing a heavy horsewhip, which stood midsummer—float in mid air. Higher up little flocks of snow-white clouds wander peacefully in the blue.

Immanuel dared not look up to watch them; there were too many lusty weeds growing in the shallow trenches under the waving ribbons of the corn. Some of them stoutly resisted the big hoe in the small hands. It appeared that a personal encounter was necessary, but if a long, fibrous tap root has taken firm hold of the tenacious clay beneath the crumbling loam, and its crown of green leaves be succulent, it sometimes happens that one may decapitate a weed without destroying it. Having added a fraction of this fact to his stock of agricultural knowledge, the boy beheaded many weeds with joyful haste, burying the tell-tale stumps of the foe in the loose earth. Thus he traveled down the long row, pausing now and again to straighten his aching shoulders with a long breath of satisfaction.

Through the twinkling green leaves, the heavy, stoop-shouldered figure of his task-master could be seen approaching in the opposite direction. The farmer was cutting and thrusting thiher and yon with a mixture place of honor, while his host occupies the chair on the right. Before any serious conversation can begin, cups of tea must be brought in and sipped by every one present. After the seating and tea-drinking had been successfully accomplished, under Mr. Lownes supervision, the lieutenant viceroy began by telling me that he had received a telegram from Prince Chung in Peking, informing him that I was on my way to Singan, and to render to me every assistance in his power.

"Of course," he added, "when His Highness commands, I obey; but I wish to tell you that in this case it gives me great personal pleasure to do so."

"I want you to say to the paper that sent all this money to Shensi, that we are grateful to the Americans for their generosity. It is being talked about all over China. It will make us love the United States more than ever."

In estimating Oriental expression of fervor a discount must usually be made in order to reduce it to a practical matter-of-fact Western level, but Chou Fu's manner was so earnest and deliberate that I am inclined to believe that he meant every word he said.

I asked him about the seriousness of the famine. "It is very, very bad," was his reply, interpreted by Mr. Lowrie. Then the lieutenant viceroy looked at the floor and was silent. The reason was another kink in Chinese etiquette, which forbids an official discussing with a foreigner the details of the empire's distress. It is considered a great demand upon his dignity to be compelled to admit that any distress exists at all. He asked about the United States, and said that "Americans were always kind."

The Mayor talked in the same strain, and then both arose, and before leaving made a formal expression of gratitude to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for "telling Americans about the hunger of Chinamen, so far away."

Paoting-fu, the capital of the province of Chili, after more than eighteen months of chaos, that began with the Boxer massacres and ended with the taking of the city by the allies, has begun to put on gala attire in anticipation of the visit of the Emperor and court, who will spend three days there on their way to Peking. The city has a population of about 35,000. Perhaps more than at any other city in North China, the labors of missionaries bore fruit here. This made it a centre of Boxer fanaticism. A row of more than twelve headstones in a cabbage-field marks the graves of the missionary martyrs. "Punitive expeditions" followed later. The former lieutenant viceroy was beheaded by the allies, and Chou Fu, a man of progressive ideas, was brought from the south of China to take his place. The Germans burned Buddhist temples, and the French subjected Paoting-fu to the greatest humiliation possible to be inflicted on a Chinese town, by blowing down a section of the city wall. But now the Boxers have gone and so have the foreign troops. Peace has come at last to troubled Paoting-fu.

Li Hung Chang is viceroy of Chili, and consequently the long low yamen building is called his residence, although he has not occupied it for years. More than a hundred workmen are now renovating the interior as a temporary residence for the Emperor. Preparations are making for a celebration on a tremendous scale, as this is the first time that Hwang Ksu has ever visited the provincial capital of the province of which Peking is the centre.

One merchant has received an order for 10,000 catties (13,000 pounds) of candles for a night illumination, another has the contract for the imperial tiffin, which will cost thousands of taels.

Mayor Wu Ku Tung gave to me an imposing piece of tissue paper, on which were a number of Chinese characters, and his seal. This Wun Shu, as it is called, announced that the bearer was going to Shensi to tell Americans about the famine there, and that he was to be given three carts and two horses for the transportation of himself and servants, and was to be provided with food and lodging as far as Tai Yuen, when he would be received by the Viceroy of Shansi.

The way to Tai Yuen is divided into stages of a day's journey each, and the Wun Shu was addressed to the magistrate of the town at the end of the next stage. He receives it, follows its instructions, and then issues a copy of it, which serves a similar purpose until the official of the next town is reached. He, in turn, repeats the process for the next stage, and so on, all the way to Shansi's capital.

Such was the end of our first day's stage. By an agreement made less than a month ago with the representatives of foreign governments in Peking, a system of relay patrols of Chinese soldiers has just been established all the way from Ting Chow to Tai-yuen, for the sole purpose of escorting and protecting foreign travelers.

Any European or American, whose passport is countersigned by his minister to China, can command the services of the patrols, although ordinarily the patrol merely rides along with the traveler in order to make him secure against attacks from robbers or nomadic Boxers, but they have nothing to do with looking up the local magistrates for him, or in finding him food and lodging. As far as Cheng Ting each patrol rides only as far as his next station, five miles away, and then turns the traveler under his charge over to the next relay.

Our patrol started from the door of the Ting Chou yamen, and rode slightly in advance through the gates in the city wall on the road towards the southwest. Each man carried a Mannlicher rifle and wore the red blouse of the Chinese army. Big, strapping fellows they were, on stocky, rugged ponies. Their pig-tails were curled up under black silk turbans and their faces were bronzed and reddened by the sun, so that they looked far more like North American Indians than Mongolians. Their manner, too, was like that of Indians. They sat very erect in the saddle, and maintained a taciturn silence, except when the leader would occasionally smile and ask, "If the foreigners were comfortable." The reply he received was always an affirmative, although compared with a Pullman sleeping car, traveling in China is not of the happiest. In a literal sense all of North China is covered with the "dust of ages." It gets in your eyes and ears and nose, and forms a thick coating on your hair and clothes. Such a thing as a road, in the American sense, would be a radical innovation which might start another revolution. A Chinese road is only the space between the fields which is not under cultivation. The fields are cared for and are reasonably smooth, but the road is neither.

The country for two hundred miles south of Peking is a plain as level as a table, in which the landscape is broken only by gray brick houses and occasional clumps of trees. Just about every inch of the land is under cultivation. By assiduous fertilizing and irrigation this sandy soil is made to bear, in most cases, two crops a year. Scattered through the fields are hundreds of men, women, and children, spreading manure for the year's second millet crop; but few of them live near the places where they work. They are nearly all residents of villages, and many walk miles every day to and from their farms.

Just before dark, we came to a massive brick archway that spanned the road. Under it stood a bareheaded man in a black gown, who violently gesticulated to the chief of our patrol. The substance of what he had to say was that we had reached Sinlo, and that quarters had been assigned to us in the village inn, to which we were escorted by a motley, chattering crowd.

One of the many things that China needs is a few good hotels. The inn where this is written is a one-story, mud building. The floors are of clay, and the chairs are kept from falling to pieces by bits of twine. The mandarin of Sinlo called a few minutes after we had settled down to a polyglot dinner, that included sharks' fins, lotus seeds and American canned sausages. The mandarin came in a sedan chair, and was preceded by a score of servants, carrying paper lanterns. He was a stout, good-natured, rural Chinaman, who asked all sorts of questions about the United States, as we sipped our tea together. He wanted to know who was "the emperor of America since the killing of the last one." When I gave him the name of our present President, he made several ineffectual attempts to pronounce it, and naively said that he couldn't understand how any man could have such a funny name.

Oh, the age of this civilization! Like the gray dust of the roads, it covers and clings like a heavy cloak. When did it begin? In the dawn of time. Who founded it? Unanswerable. Will it go on forever? The next decade may tell. FRANCIS H. NICHOLS.

Flood Relief Work at Wuhu

Miss Mitchell, an American missionary at Wuhu, is doing an excellent relief work among the Yangtze flood sufferers at Wuhu. Mrs. J. Woodberry, another American missionary, has written a detailed description of the work for The North China News. The most available place in which to start what Miss Mitchell contemplated was a Taoist temple, and this she secured with the aid of kindly-disposed and influential natives and the local taotai. Here she has opened a general relief headquarters, which combines all the features of a free soup kitchen, a sewing room for the preparation of clothing for the poor, a general assembly room for religious services, and a schoolroom for the young. In the dining-room the cooked rice is put into bowls, and passed to the waiting rows of poor people, who sit down on the mats, and eat the wholesome food with chopsticks, after a simple "grace" has been said. Bowl after bowl is consumed, some of the hungry guests eating as many as five bowlsful before their appetites are appeased. This is the only daily meal they receive at the present time, and were it not for Miss Mitchell's forethought in organizing such a work, hundreds would have been dead of starvation.

TRAINED FOR SERVICE

Varied Experience of Two Leaders in the Lord's Work

...BY...
MRS. M. BAXTER

THE inspired biographies of the two men of God, Joseph, the deliverer of Egypt, and Moses, the deliverer of Israel, show us the Master Workman forming, and then using, his instruments. We understand our God better for the study of his dealings with and through these two men: we get the clue to his dealings with ourselves and with others, and in deep adoration we say with the apostle of the Gentiles, "Oh, the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

Joseph, the son of the beloved Rachel, was born into an atmosphere of special tenderness and affection, and became the favorite son of an indulgent father, his mother having died early. Moses was born in far different circumstances: he was born under sentence of death, and only God's response to his parents' faith procured his preservation. Joseph's training was in the home-life of his father's tent, with all the surroundings of a patriarch's family, in which the sacred traditions of God's dealings with man were carefully handed down, and formed the basis of his education. Moses, on the contrary, as soon as he was old enough, was instructed in heathen literature, and taught in the highest schools of Egypt. And yet it was Joseph who was to rule in Egypt, and Moses in the wilderness! Human wisdom would have reversed this order. Man's wisdom would have used a graduate of the Egyptian universities to be Pharaoh's right-hand man, and the man who was brought up to outdoor work in keeping sheep to lead a host of shepherds and herdsmen through the desert.

But God's ways are "past finding out"; his thoughts are not as our thoughts (Isa. 55: 8), and we see in the history of these two men how much more the knowledge of God, obedience to and trust in him tells upon the future of a life than the intellectual education, valuable as that is in its place. While one verse out of the entire Bible tells of Moses' youth, his learning, and the position in Egypt which he acquired by it (Acts 7: 22) three whole chapters are given to Joseph's youth and his sufferings; first in his own home, then at Shechem, by the persecution of his brothers, and later on in Egypt, as a slave and as a prisoner. Moses, the learned man, could not be trusted with his ministry until he was eighty years of age; Joseph was ready for his at the age of thirty (com. Gen. 41: 46 with Exod. 7: 7). The learning of Moses was probably not in itself the reason of this, but its effect on Moses was to make him self-confident, and less pliable than Joseph was. Both men were fully true to God, but there was less of the flesh to be conquered in Joseph than in Moses; and thus the education of the latter for his ministry was more protracted.

Joseph gave in at once to every circumstance which God permitted. God never needed to say to him, as he said to Jacob, "I am with thee" (Gen. 28: 15), or to Moses, "Certainly I will be with thee" (Exod. 3: 12). "The Lord was with Joseph" (Gen. 39: 2-23); the presence of the Lord was his characteristic as it was that of Elijah (I. Kings 17: 1). Consequently God had no controversy with Joseph as he had with Moses. Joseph asked no questions, but let himself be led; and accepted all from the hands of his God, whom he knew and whom he trusted. Joseph suffered through the wrong-doing of others; Moses "looked this way and that" before slaying the Egyptian, to save himself from the consequences of his act; and when he knew that it was known, he fled from Egypt for fear of Pharaoh. There was no such fear in Joseph. Yet the time came when Moses was as fully yielded to God and as supple in his hands as Joseph had been.

There was power in the presence of Joseph because the Lord was with him, and in the first interview which he had with the king, his antecedents, the shameful accusation of Potiphar's wife, and his having entered Egypt as a slave, were utterly lost sight of; the king saw in him a wisdom which was not of man, and at once he was trusted with the affairs of the kingdom. Moses, on the contrary, did not carry with him in the same measure the presence of the Lord, when he first appeared before Pharaoh. His contention with God had resulted in Aaron being united with him. Aaron not having had the same dealings with God was, perhaps, not always a help; and Moses himself was not fully obedient and trustful. But as soon as he became fully one with God, when he spoke and did all that God commanded (Exod. 6: 29; 7: 2-6), then "the man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh's servants, and in the sight of the people" (Exod. 11: 3).

CAST HIS LOT WITH THE NEWSBOYS

James Eads How, the Rich St. Louis Philanthropist, and his Life-work—Selling Papers on the Streets

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE

I WANT to help these poor waifs of the streets—to reach them in their tenderest years, and teach them the need of man for his brother, the dependence of each upon his associates in the group to which he belongs. So I have come down to live among them, because I want to be one of them, to share their trials, so that I may possibly benefit them." Such is the explanation made by Mr. James Eads How, the wealthy citizen of St. Louis, whose unique philanthropy in connection with the newsboys of that city has attracted much attention.

He is the owner of a beautiful and luxurious home on Lindell avenue, an aristocratic section of the city; but he has voluntarily given up a life that promised to be one of ease and pleasure and become the tenant of a room in a common lodging-house in the slums, in order that he may live among the class he desires to benefit. Nay, more; to the astonishment of his rich friends, and the surprise of the newsboys themselves, he has adopted the calling of a newsboy, and may be seen selling papers in the downtown streets of St. Louis in all weathers. He is thus putting into practical operation the true theory of all successful Christian work—that the helper must come down to his work, if his heart is in it and he desires to do efficient service.

Mr. How has consecrated his life and his fortune to the work in question. It is as yet only in the investigating stage, but by and by, as he becomes more familiar with the situation, and learns the best and most practical methods, his philanthropy will assume a still more substantial form. Speaking on the subject with the representative of a Western newspaper, Mr. How said:

"In the work, the great work that the new age demands, it seems that the children should be taught first of all. The changes which are coming they will live in longer than we who are grown. If they come to understand how man must stand by man, they will be, I should think, the most potent influences in effecting some betterment of the present condition. This seems a little selfish, does it not, this speaking of human beings as mere tools, something like 'the economic man?' I want, too, to help the boys now. I would like to help men, too. But I don't know but what they ought to help themselves. And perhaps the boys ought to help themselves, too. Yet I cannot think that it will be wrong of any one to lend them a hand. What I am striving for now is to teach the boys, not force them, to form a co-operative association—a Newsboys' Co-operative Society, perhaps. They would be better off if they had a co-operative company, wherein all were members, so that this association could buy the papers direct from the publishers, and have the middleman's profits go to the boys collectively. They might then branch out into a co-operative company. They would be benefited by having a good, clean, wholesome place to go to spend their leisure time in, and to be able

there to read what they need, and to get baths and all that? All these things might be accomplished by such an association. Such a club, or society, or brotherhood might go out of the mere traffic in papers, and become a co-operative purchasing agency for all that the boys need—their clothes, playthings, and lunches. If these newsboys can be made to work for themselves, each for himself, through co-operation with his associates, rather than by antagonism to them, it would seem, certainly, that they had stepped a little forward toward the new age. This idea of mine, or of the great body of the people with whom I am a co-worker, is to teach and live out the doctrine of love and work. If these poor waifs selling papers on the streets could learn the lesson, and many of them become missionaries of this gospel in their humble ways, great good would result, both to themselves and to others."

It is something over a year ago since Mr. How first began his experiment looking to the betterment of the newsboys. A number of these waifs used to gather in an alley, in the rear of a building, between Olive and Locust streets, St. Louis. They had no organization and the influences that surrounded them were not of the best. He endeavored, in a tentative way to help them by organizing them, and he talked to them in a way that won their confidence and respect. It was clear to him, even then, that there was good material in the lads, and he resolved to make it his life-work to help in the moral and social elevation of their class, as a whole. He is associated with other benevolences, but there is none that lies so close to his heart as the cause of the newsboys of St. Louis.

"I cannot say how long I shall continue to sell papers on the streets," said Mr. How; "I want to gain the entire confidence of the boys." And he is unquestionably doing this rapidly, for the little fellows, far from regarding him as an interloper and business rival, love him and trust him implicitly. He is making headway, and it needs no prophet to predict that soon the rich young philanthropist will have knit to himself in the stoutest fraternal bonds, an army of newsboys, who, knowing him to be their true friend, will accept his guidance unquestioningly.

It is an interesting and unique experiment, actuated by Christ-like motives. Holding his wealth as a sacred trusteeship, this young citizen of the West is working on lines parallel with those followed by Dr. Barnardo, the founder of over half a hundred newsboys' homes in England, and by Charles L. Brace, the friend and benefactor of a great multitude of American newsboys. His efforts will be watched with deep interest by all who have the highest welfare of the waifs at heart, and who desire to see them helped to become worthy and industrious, law-abiding citizens and earnest Christians.

MR. HOW'S SLEEPING QUARTERS IN THE LODGING HOUSE

"WIDDER BROWN"

IT was three summers ago. The July sun beat down upon the hills. The hot air danced with a wave-like motion above the heated land.

Farmer Short, with a full force of "hands," had been working busily all the morning "hayin' down in the lower medder by the crick." Farmer Short is characterized by industry and despatch; his wife by economy. His directions to his help that morning were, "Boys, 'make hay while the sun shines; I think we are goin' to have fallin' weather soon." A rain would have been a relief to all who did not, like Farmer Short, have some interest at stake that made the scorching air a benefit. As he tossed the last forkful of hay upon the load, and leaned on his fork to rest, he glanced toward the house, half a mile away, and said, "We'll try to get one more load before dinner." Then, "Well, I swan! Mike, if there don't go Widder Brown along the lane up to our house." As he wiped the perspiration from his face with the red cotton handkerchief he carried in his hat, he said to the driver, "Mike, I'm afraid that woman will be sun-struck. I am shore!" Mike only said, as he drove away, "Must be pressin' business to make the old woman walk nigh on to two mile this time o'day."

Mike drove to the barn, unloaded, and drove back to the hayfield. Still Widow Brown toiled on up the hot, dusty road. The next load was half on the wagon when she turned in at the gate, as Mrs.

Short came out on the porch with a pan of potatoes to peel. "Land sakes, Mrs. Brown, ain't you melted?" called Mrs. Short, from the porch. "I 'spose it's foolish in me," began Widow Brown, apologetically, "but you know, last winter, when I read about the starving people in India I came over, and Edith wrote a letter, and sent some money for me. This mornin' I was readin' to mother, and I came across this," she said, unfolding THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and pointing to an article about the destitute orphans of India, "and I jist couldn't help comin' agin."

Edith, a bright girl of sixteen, had come to the door. She got a chair and a cool drink for Widow Brown, and as her mother peeled the potatoes and Widow Brown fanned herself with her black calico sunbonnet, Edith read the article about India. It said, "Children whose parents have perished are wandering everywhere. The spectacle is one of the most painful which can be found upon earth. The cries of the orphans, if they could only enter the ears of all good people in distant lands, would stir the Christian world to such a movement of sympathy and help as has never been witnessed on earth."

When Edith had finished reading, Mrs. Brown said, with tears in her eyes, "I know what it is to be a widder. And I know what an orphan has to suffer. After my man died, mother bein' past 80 years old then, and my Willie bein' too little to be much help, and debts to be paid, I learned what a hard time means. Then when Willie took sick and died I couldn't have stood it, only I knew how much trouble he had missed. When I read about orphans it means more to me than it can mean to folks who have not been through what I have."

While talking, she had untied from the corner of a black-bordered handkerchief, two silver dollars. She said, "I want you to take these, Edith, and send them. Keep out the price of the paper and stamp and send the rest. I hadn't any paper, for now that I have rheumatism so bad in my hands I can't write at all. But you tell them the money was sent by a poor widder who lives alone with her aged mother. Tell them I made the money by quiltin' a double Irish chain for a neighbor. I want it to go to these orphan children. It seems almost that I am doin' somethin' for my own boy in helpin' them."

Then Widow Brown rose, saying she must go back and get dinner for her mother. She could not be prevailed upon to stay to dinner. Edith suggested to her mother that they give her something for dinner that she could easily carry. Mrs. Short brought out two eggs and gave them to her.

When Mrs. Brown was gone, Edith said, "Well, mamma, I would have been ashamed to give her only two eggs when you have a whole basket full, and they are so cheap."

"Why, that's enough," said her mother, "it's one for her and one for her mother."

When the men came in to dinner, Edith related the whole story, laughing at the more ludicrous parts and almost crying at the pathetic ones. She concluded by saying, "Widow Brown is always doing something like that, and when I see her hands distorted with work and rheumatism, and know that they are still able to work for others, it makes me feel mean that mine never did anybody any good." "What about the rest of us?" said Mike.

"Well," said Mr. Short, "put me down for a dollar apiece for my family." One "hand" after another decided that if Widow Brown could give two dollars, he could, too. So they arranged for the money, and Edith had a neat little sum to send when she mailed her letter that afternoon. Nor was that all, a number of people, hearing of that letter, sent others of their own.

But why think about all of this now? Last week Widow Brown died. The minister read, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, for they shall rest from their labors and their works do follow them." Though poor and unlearned, her influence was felt—not by neighbors alone—but on the other side of the world. Who can say how far down the future her works may follow her? "She hath done what she could."

In the old, neglected churchyard, surrounded by the native forest, they laid her by the side of her husband and Willie. A single sycamore tree leans toward her grave, stretching its white limbs above her as in benediction.

A NEW JEWISH ENCYCLOPEDIA

AMONG the new works announced this year, few can compare in breadth of scope and real utility with the Jewish Encyclopædia, projected by Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls, of New York, the first volume of which has now been issued. There is need for such a work, because the ordinary reader, Christian, as well as Jewish, finds it difficult to get in a ready and compact shape the information which it will contain. The prominent characteristic of our time in the religious world is to seek diligently for facts that will shed light on the Bible, and it is to Judaism principally that we must go for those facts. We are indebted to the Jews for the sacred book, and if we would understand its allusions, its metaphors and its point of view, we must know Jewish character, literature and history. Much of this we learn from the Bible itself, but there is a vast mine of information outside of the book accessible to Oriental scholars, but not to the English-speaking public. Even to scholars the labor of ascertaining the facts on a particular topic is enormous, for they are buried under a mass of tradition and are scattered through a wide field of literature to which there are few guides. The publishers have therefore made arrangements to present such information in an Encyclopedic form, so that the student's time and labor shall be saved. Some idea of the colossal labor involved in rendering this service, may be gained from the fact that no less than twenty-five thousand topics are contained in the provisional index prepared for the work. Twelve such volumes as that already published will be required to exhaust the field, in the thorough manner proposed. That it will be well and skilfully done is assured by the character and erudition of the editors who have the direction of the work. Among them are Dr. Cyrus Adler, Dr. Gotthard Deutsch, Dr. Louis Ginzburg, Dr. Richard Gottheil, Dr. Marcus Jastrow, Dr. Kaufmann Kohler, Dr. F. De Sola Mendes, Dr. Isidore Singer, Prof. C. H. Toy, Dr. I. K. Funk, who is Chairman of the Board, and Frank H. Vizetelly, who is Secretary. Besides these, there are fifteen consulting editors in America and twenty-nine in Europe.

The fact that the list contains the names of Christians as well as Jews is a guarantee that customs and observances having a significance of special interest to the Christian theologian will receive a due share of attention, and that we shall learn from Jewish scholars the exact import of types and ceremonies which, as we believe, were fulfilled in Christ. Thus every Biblical topic passes through two stages besides its statement in Biblical language. There is, first, the interpretation placed upon it by Jews in the Talmud, Midrash and later Jewish commentaries; and second the interpretation by the higher critics. It will also include the recent discoveries by explorers in Egypt and Assyria, the value of which is chiefly estimated by their bearing on the Old Testament.

The editors explain in their preface the plan pursued in order to exhaustively cover the subject. They have divided their labors into three great parts, which are subdivided into departments. 1. History, which includes biography, sociology and folk-lore. 2. Literature, comprising Biblical, Hellenistic, Talmudical, Rabbinical and Mediæval works. 3. Theology, which naturally includes philosophy. The biographical section is necessarily one of the most important, and so thoroughly is it intended to cover this ground that no Jewish man or woman who has attained prominence in any sphere, from the time of Abraham to the present day, shall be overlooked. This department will not show any discrimination against those who separated themselves from the ancient faith and observance, like Lord Beaconsfield and Emin Pasha, both of whom were of the Jewish race.

The first volume extends only to the topic Apocalyptic Literature. This is due not to a lack of perspective, but to the accidental circumstance that so many of the topics associated with Judaism have the first letter of the alphabet as an initial. An important word is the alphabet itself, which involves a discussion of the much-debated question of the origin of the Hebrew letters, the use of which appears to have been general up to the time of the Babylonian captivity, when they were superseded for general use by the Aramaic. The word "Academies," also is the text for some important considerations of Jewish education in ancient times. "America," also, is a prolific word, the article on which deals with the status of the Jews in our own land. Agricultural colonies, too, is a topic on which much valuable information of a modern character is supplied, affecting the situation of the Jew both in America and Palestine. Animals, Alexandria, Anti-Semitism also are topics for articles full of interest both to Christian and Jewish students. Many of the pages are illustrated from ancient and modern sources, the maps especially being of great value. This volume contains so much that must be new to Christian scholars, yet so valuable to a clear understanding of the Bible, that future volumes will be eagerly anticipated and heartily welcomed.

MISCHIEF MAKER.

A Surprise In Brooklyn.

An adult's food that can save a baby proves itself to be nourishing and easily digested and good for big and little folks. A Brooklyn man says: "When baby was about eleven months old he began to grow thin and pale. This was, at first, attributed to the heat and the fact that his teeth were coming, but, in reality, the poor little thing was starving, his mother's milk not being sufficient nourishment."

One day after he had cried bitterly for an hour, I suggested that my wife try him on Grape-Nuts. She soaked two teaspoonfuls in a saucer with a little sugar and warm milk. This baby ate so ravenously that she fixed a second which he likewise finished. It was not many days before he forgot all about being nursed, and has since lived almost exclusively on Grape-Nuts. Today the boy is strong and robust, and as cute a mischief-maker as a thirteen months old baby is expected to be.

We have put before him other foods, but he will have none of them, evidently preferring to stick to that which did him so much good in his time of need—his old friend Grape-Nuts.

Use this letter any way you wish, for my wife and I can never praise Grape-Nuts enough after the happiness it has brought to our household. These statements can be verified by anyone who wishes to make a visit to our home." F. F. McElroy, 256 So. 3rd St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Grape-Nuts is not made for a baby food, but experience with thousands of babies shows it to be among the best, if not entirely the best in use. Being a scientific preparation of Nature's grains, it is equally effective as a body and brain builder for grown-ups.

A GREAT SINGER GONE

THE announcement, on November 20, of the death of the well-known hymn writer and famous singing evangelist, at his home in Wheaton, Ill., John H. Burke, caused widespread sorrow. The Sunday following, November 24, his wife followed him to the "Better Land." The cause of death in both cases was "sewer gas."

Mr. Burke was making his arrangements for a new Gospel-Song tour at the time his summons came. In a letter to an old friend here, Mr. Hubert P. Main, of Bigelow & Main, he wrote enthusiastically a few weeks before his death of his plans for entering afresh the field of his Master's service. He had been engaged for a while in some secular work in Chicago, but it had not been congenial; he had ever felt that "singing for the Lord" was for him life's "better part."

JOHN H. BURKE

Mr. Burke had sung the Gospel around the world. In January, 1888, Mr. D. L. Moody came to hold meetings in Chicago, where Mr. Burke was then teaching singing and leading choirs. The committee in charge engaged Mr. Burke to lead the singing during the first week, at the end of which time Mr. Moody asked Mr. Burke to continue with him through the coming campaign of four months. "That was the parting of the ways for me," Mr. Burke said afterwards, in giving the story of his life, "and I decided to give myself entirely to Gospel singing. I joined Mr. Moody in Montreal, Canada, in October, 1888, and the following winter went with him to the Pacific Coast, and worked with him, or under his direction, for about ten years, in the United States, Canada and Europe. In January, 1892, I joined Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey in Scotland, and worked with them there, afterward working with Mr. Moody in England and Ireland. Returning to Scotland I joined Rev. John McNeill, of London, who had just begun evangelistic work, and worked with him until May, 1893, when we came to Chicago to take part in Mr. Moody's World's Fair Campaign. In 1894 I made a trip around the world, singing the Gospel with Rev. John McNeill. We made a circuit of about three thousand miles in South Africa, holding meetings in all the principal towns in Cape Colony, the Orange Free State, the Transvaal and Natal. We worked in Melbourne, Victoria, Sydney, New South Wales, Adelaide, and all the cities in Australia and Tasmania, and the same in New Zealand. I have also worked with Major D. W. Whittle, Rev. A. C. Dixon, Rev. L. W. Marshall, and others. I was with Mr. Moody in his last campaigns in New York and led the Carnegie Hall choir. I worked also with Rev. A. C. Dixon through Greater New York." In the summer of 1900, he was with French E. Olivar in Salt Lake City. Meetings were held every night for seven weeks in a tent seating about 2,500 people. There were many conversions.

Mr. Burke's new Gospel-Song work was to be under the auspices of the Moody Bible Institute Extension and was to begin at New Year. In his lecture of Nov. 20, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, Mr. Moody's successor, paid eloquent tribute to the dead singer; one of his latest hymns was sung and prayer was offered in behalf of his bereaved family.

A Mayor's Conversion

An incident related by Dr. Newman Hall, author of the famous little work so widely blessed of God, Come to Jesus, shows how much good may be done by placing a really good book in the hands of a boy. Dr. Hall was announced to preach in a thriving town on the Eastern coast of England. On his arrival he received a letter from the Mayor, expressing his regret that, owing to an accident, he would be unable to attend the service. The writer went on to explain his personal indebtedness to Dr. Hall, which increased his disappointment at missing the service. He said: "Through poverty I had to commence life's struggle for existence very early, and without education, as a fishing lad, in 1851. About two years later, I was brought under the good influence of a pious shipmate, who gave me the little book, Come to Jesus. He encouraged and helped me to read it. I read it again and again. It was the first book I ever read through, and its influence upon my early life was great and good. How much I owe to it for the prosperity and joy of my life I cannot tell. I must now ask you kindly to accept the warmest thanks that words by this feeble method can convey." "I called to see the writer," says Dr. Hall, "the next morning. He added an interesting fact. He had labored vainly to learn to read by puzzling over several other books, when the giver of the tract said, 'This one is so simple that a child can make it out.' 'So,' added my informant, 'I first read the booklet as a reading exercise. But by thus learning my letters, I was led to learn the Gospel.' This is a striking instance of how a person in the humbler walks of life may, by lending a little book, help a poor lad to Christ, and be the means of raising him to a position in which, by his social influence, personal exertions, and generous gifts, he has become one of Christ's 'fishers of men.'"

The Old Shoemaker and the Infidel

A reader of this paper, Mr. W. H. V., of White River, Col., sends this interesting anecdote: "In our neighborhood lived an old shoemaker on a little farm, and on rainy days and in bad weather he mended shoes. He was one of the most devout members of the church, and though he could neither read nor write, yet no one, not even the minister, could make a stronger prayer or get 'nearer to God' than he. And he lived his religion every day in the week, so that no one could doubt his sincerity. We had also in our community an avowed infidel, a man who never missed an opportunity to get a crowd around him and to try to prove to them that the Bible and its teachings were false. He made the boast that 'some day he was going over to take all the religion out of the old shoemaker.' One day he wanted his shoes half-soled, so he went over and soon brought up his favorite subject. As he talked, the old man pegged away at the shoes, and said nothing. After a while the infidel wanted to know if the old man didn't think that he was about right and that 'the Bible was a humbug.' The old shoemaker stopped his pegging and looked up. 'Well now,' he said quietly, 'if the Bible is not true, when we both come to die, I am in just as good a fix as you are. But if the Bible is true, and Christ is a reality, then when we both come to die, I am saved and you are lost.' And he smiled and resumed his work. 'When I heard of it, I said to myself that until I heard some argument that would answer the old shoemaker's, I would never read an infidel book of any kind, nor go and hear an infidel talk. Many a time during the last thirty years, when I have heard some one ridicule religion and the Bible, the old shoemaker's answer would come to my mind, and I would think 'what a poor consolation infidelity has, where it's all to lose and nothing to gain.'"

The Bible in Spain

A colporteur selling Bibles went to the village of Montalborejo in the Province of Toledo, in Spain. He sold one Bible and then was attacked and driven out by the priests. Six weeks afterward approaching the same village, he was met by a man who recognized him. "Are you not the man who sold the Bible?" With fear and trembling, he answered: "Yes, I am the man." "Then come to our village; every one of us desires to purchase your book," was the amazing reply.

in a corner. "I'll larn ye both who's boss in this house!"

Elizabeth caught imploringly at her husband's arm. "Rastus!" she begged, "don't ye—don't! Fer heaven's sake—Rastus! Fer the sake of our own child 'at 's dead—don't ye tech him!"

Without a word, the man wrenched himself loose from the clinging hands. In another minute Elizabeth heard the heavy door of the barn shut with a bang. "Oh, mercy, he'll kill him!" she muttered, wringing her hands weakly.

She darted into the road. There was no one in sight, but from beyond the crest of the hill there arose the faint intermittent creak and rattle of wagon wheels. The vehicle itself shortly hove into view. Elizabeth ran toward it wildly.

It was a long wagon, painted black; the man who drove the single white horse sat stiffly erect. He wore black clothes, and interposed the shelter of a black umbrella betwixt the fierce rays of the July sun and his uncovered head; a straw hat of the same somber hue, albeit tempered by age, reposed on the seat beside him. In the bed of the wagon, a wrinkled oilcloth, also of rusty black, imperfectly concealed the outlines of a long box.

Elizabeth threw up her hands with a smothered scream. "It's an awful bad sign!" she muttered. Then the more urgent fear conquered. "Mr. Dundor!" she called; "fer pity's sake do stop a minit!"

The driver of the wagon drew up at once. "Is that you, Mis' Winch? I declare I scarcely knew you! I was just on my way to—"

"Don't wait a minit!" cried Elizabeth wildly. "He'll kill the child ef somebody don't stop him! Fer the land's sake hurry! I'll hold the horse!"

The undertaker scanned the flushed face of the woman in obvious perplexity. "It's 'Manuel! He's done somethin'—I don't know what—an' 'Rastus got mad at him. He's got him in the barn now a-lickin' him! He's terrible ha'sh, 'Rastus is. Go an' knock on the barn door, do—I beg of ye! Tell him you called to see him 'bout somethin'!"

"Why—ee, Mis' Winch, I'd like to 'bleege you, I would really, but I can't say 'at I feel called upon to—ah—interfere in a case of discipline. Who'd I understand 'you to say was gettin' c'orrected?"

"Oh, Mr. Dundor, it's 'Manuel; an' he's only six years old. You know 'Rastus, how terrible ha'sh he's allers been! Don't wait another minit! Please get out! I—I'll do most anythin' fer you, ef you only will!"

"'Manuel?' repeated Mr. Dundor with exasperating deliberation. "Why didn't I hear you'd named that there child found in your—"

"Yes, that's him! Won't you go? God bless ye, Liph Dundor!"

Mr. Dundor climbed stiffly down over the wheel, his face curiously mottled as if from the stirring of some strenuous inward motive. "The mare 'll stan' all right," he said, turning to the woman. "I guess if I was you I'd make myself scarce."

"I won't do to let him mistrust what we're up to." He made his way through the tangle of blossoming May-weed, which bordered the road, the pungent odor bringing an unaccustomed tear to his eyes. "Seein' it's her young one, I'll do it," he muttered. "It'll kind of square accounts along of that casket." He bent his head to listen, then brought down his whip-handle in a smart rat-tat on the closed door of the barn. A wailing sob from within caused him to repeat the operation with urgent emphasis.

This time the door flew wide, and Winch stood on the threshold, a threateningly belligerent look on his big-featured face. "Wha'd'yer want?" he demanded.

"Why, old-hemlock, neighbor! but I'm mighty glad to find ye so easy!" began Mr. Dundor, with a free and exuberant friendliness of manner. "I was just on my way over to Jabez Turnersers with a fust-class casket for ol' Mis' Turner, I dunno as you've heard 'at—"

"I don't see as that's any of my biz," growled Winch, laying hold on the door, with the manifest intention of closing it in his visitor's face. "I ain't got no time to fool away gassin'."

"Hold on a minit, neighbor—not so fast!" cried Mr. Dundor, with infinite tact. "That's just what it is—a little matter of business this time; it'll fetch you in mebbe—half a dollar. That's worth a word or two—eh?"

Winch cast a frowning glance over his shoulder, then he stepped out and set his back against the closed door. "Wall!" he ejaculated with a tentative relaxation of his grim mouth.

"As I was remarkin'," observed Mr. Dundor, resuming something of the solemnity incident to his profession, "I'm on my way to Turnersers with a fust-class, a-number-one casket for ol' Mis' Turner, 'at passed away yistiday to a better lan' in an apoplectic fit; I dunno as you've heard the sad intelligence?"

"I ain't heerd it," said the other doggedly, "an' what's more I don't keer now 't I hev herd. Them Turners was always a meechin' lot. I ain't never took no stock in any of 'em."

"They are a weak set and that's a fac'," acquiesced Mr. Dundor pleasantly. "They ain't none of 'em long for this vale of tears, I reckon. That's why I stopped here. I got started with the casket, an' thinks s' I, when I git there, like enough there won't be a soul 'bout the place able to help me in with it. I want you should get onto the wagon with me an' ride out. If half a dollar 'll be any injucement, why—"

"Make it a dollar an' I'll go with ye," said Winch. "You c'n put it int' the gen'ral expenses," he added with a wink. "I'll never be able to hev a fun'ral to my place; I ain't rich 'nough."

The two men were walking slowly toward the wagon, when Winch caught sight of the anxious face of Elizabeth. "Confound it all!" he muttered. "I'd like to hev forgot what I was doin'. I'll hev to hev a word with my wife afore I go."

He thrust his shaggy head into the open window. "I seen yer—a-peekin'," he growled. "Say, Mis' Winch, I'm goin' out fur a spell, you leave that boy alone whilst I'm gone, d' ye hear? Don't you go nigh him."

"Why, where you goin' 'Rastus?" asked Elizabeth, with well feigned surprise. "Ain't that Liph Dundor? I was jist a-lookin' to see who 't was."

"Give me my coat thar an' shet yer gab," responded Winch agreeably. "An' say! If I ain't home by four o'clock, you c'n hev him drive up the cows; you c'n milk."

Elizabeth stood in the kitchen door watching the departure of the black wagon drawn by the white horse; the mournful creak and rattle of the slow-revolving wheels floated back to her on the hot breeze. "My!" she murmured, shaking her head with a deep sigh; "it was an awful bad sign—a-meetin' that coffin plumb in the middle of the road! I'm most afraid to go out there an' look!"

A Great Christmas Dinner

The Salvation Army is planning another mammoth Christmas Dinner for the Poor at Madison Square Garden. On the morning of December 25, 17,000 dinners will be distributed in baskets to poor families, each basket containing sufficient provisions for five persons. At six P.M. 3,000 dinners will be served on the main floor of the Garden, to be followed by a grand musical entertainment.

On New Year's Day there will be a fine Christmas tree celebration for children, when gifts of toys, clothing and other useful articles will be distributed among needy little ones. Thousands of unfortunates, old and young, will be made happy on this, as on preceding Christmas holidays, through the Army's generosity and devotion and the contributions of the public, which each year have given practical encouragement to Consul and Commander Booth-Tucker in this good work.

SHOOTS AGAIN

Although Coffee Took His Eyesight For Awhile.

A Colorado camp cook had to quit his job because he could not make coffee without drinking it himself and it was killing him. He says he used to take a cup of coffee before he got his breakfast for the men, for he felt the need of keeping up his strength and his stomach troubled him so much.

"Finally," he says, "I got so bad I was taken to the hospital. The doctor told me it was a clear case of coffee poison and if I did not quit I would never get well. I had to quit in the hospital and gradually got a little better, then I took to drinking Postum Food Coffee and took it out with me to a job in the woods."

I have been using Postum steadily for about eighteen months and have entirely recovered from dyspepsia, and all my old aches and ails. My eyes are so well now that I can see the gun sights as good as any body, but two years ago I never could hunt because of my eyes. I know it is the quitting of coffee and using Postum that has benefited me. Nobody could have dyspepsia any worse than I had. All my neighbors thought I was going to die, but I am all right now. I have to send thirty-five miles to the city of Trinidad for my Postum but it is worth while." Wm. Green, Burwing, Colorado.

NUMBERING THE DAYS*

PAST EXPERIENCE A GUIDE AND A WARNING
FOR FUTURE SERVICE

VERY suggestive is the petition of the Psalmist and the object he desires to attain by it: "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." The prayer seems to have a forward as well as a backward look. We cannot number the days that are before us, but as we number the days that are past, we may learn a lesson for the days ahead be they few or many. Much of the value of the exercise depends on the method of the numbering. The boy numbers them gladly and eagerly, for every day added to the roll brings him nearer manhood, when he will be his own master and may do great things. In mid-life the numbering is not quite so pleasant a process. Time will not stand still even for those who would wish it to do so and every day brings old age nearer. Further on in life the numbering is apt to be attended by sadness. Even those for whom death has no terrors, who, weary of life and longing for the better land, number their days, cannot do so without regret. Looking back, the memory recalls days that have been wasted, days on which some duty might have been performed that was never done. Some, alas, have to number days that they would gladly blot from the record if they could, days given up to sin. But not in these ways does the Psalmist desire to number his days. His is a practical object. He would so number them that he might apply his heart unto wisdom.

At the close of the year, the mind turns instinctively to this flight of time. For good or ill, another year has passed and cannot be recalled. What has it brought? What record does it take away? In numbering its days, how many must be marked as wasted? The record for the majority of us is humiliating. So many good resolutions broken; so many opportunities gone by forever unimproved; so many things done which should not have been done. Conscience brings up the sad record and confronts us with it. But we shall miss the benefit of the consideration, if sorrow and regret are the only results. Unavailing remorse is the most wasteful of all emotions. It benumbs the faculties and paralyzes all effort. We have sadly to note that so much of life is gone without the good that we hoped for and then we must turn to the future with new resolve. There is so much less before us, but that little should be used with more intense earnestness. We need to number our days so as to learn the causes of our failures, so that we may avoid them in the future. The future days are more precious, because there are not so many of them as there were, and we cannot tell how few there may be. To know how and why we failed, or stumbled, is to have knowledge like a light on our way. We cannot afford to waste our days now, and we must take the light of past experience to keep us in the straight path. Not in idle regrets but with stern resolve enlightened by past failure and past success, should we number our days.

The Psalmist's resolve was to apply his heart unto wisdom, or as the Revised Version has it, that he might get a heart of wisdom. That is the attitude of the Bible throughout. The good man is the wise man because he puts himself in line with God's will. If any good is to come of the days that are left it must be in living and working in harmony with that will. How then can we find out what his will is? Only by doing such portions of it as we do understand. It is astonishing how one duty performed sheds light on the next. He that sets himself to do God's will, as far as he knows it, learns more of that will from day to day. He gains also the power to do it. God himself increaseth strength when the will is attuned to his will. He desires our purity and development, and when he sees his child striving in the same direction he adds the force of omnipotence to his puny efforts. Therefore, while we number our days, let us go forward with courage and trusting hearts. There must have been days in the past that told us of God's helping hand. Let us not forget those, and, trusting in his promise and in his power, go forward to redeem the time.

Barbarism in Morocco

A Country on the Borders of Civilization, yet Given over to Cruelty and Oppression

IN a recent issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave a correspondent's views of life in Tangier, the capital city of Morocco. A writer in the New York Sun adds to the picture by describing the lights and shadows of social and domestic life in Morocco in a manner which proves that country to be still very far removed from civilization. He writes:

The young man who is now on the throne of Morocco is said by Europeans in that country to desire to correct the great abuses from which his people suffer. He has, for example, issued edicts providing for prison reform in all the large towns. All travelers say that the prisons of Morocco are nothing more than damp, fetid dungeons, horribly dirty and unsanitary, in which prisoners are weighed down with chains, scantily fed and nearly naked. These prisons are the most abominable feature of that degraded country.

Another reform which the Sultan wishes to carry out is a better system of taxation. He says the extortions practised upon the people by the Governors of provinces who collect taxes must cease. Of course, any attempt to put an end to the squeezing of the people, by which the Governors and their deputies have waxed wealthy, will make the Sultan unpopular among the official class.

The number of methods of torture used to extort money is practically unlimited. One of the favorite forms is that called the wooden jellabeer (shirt). This is a sort of wooden box large enough to receive the victim in a sitting posture. On the inside it is studded with sharp nails. Prisoners have been kept in this appliance for months at a time, until at length released by death. They have been killed in this terrible way because their friends have failed to make up the sum of money demanded of them. Another form of torture is an iron collar, by which the victim is chained to a wall at such a height as to oblige him to stand on tiptoe to avoid strangulation. The cutting off of a hand as punishment for theft, the loss of an eye in return for the malicious destruction of an eye, the amputation of a limb for a limb and the punishment of libel by rubbing the lips of the offender with capscum pods are matters of daily practice in Morocco, and illustrate the regime under which the Moors live almost within sight of Europe. All this cruelty, as practised according to the law of the land, has produced in the Moors an indifference to life more callous than that shown by most Orientals.

The grandfather of the present Sultan was Sidi Mohammed Abdurrahman, who died in 1873. One of the closing acts of his life may be taken as typical of the benevolence of his rule. Queen Victoria had sent him as a gift a small steam launch, which he placed in a large marble tank that was one of the chief ornaments of the beautiful gardens around his palace in the city of Morocco. One day the Sultan, with two or three of his wives, was on board this boat when it suddenly capsized. A soldier on duty in the gardens, out of view, heard the screams of the women and, rushing up, leaped into the water and saved the life of the Sultan's favorite, his Highness himself having meanwhile scrambled ashore. An hour later the gallant soldier was summoned to the august presence.

"You rescued my wife," said the Sultan. The soldier beamed with loyalty and bowed.

"Did you see her?" said the Sultan.

The soldier, off his guard, replied, "I saw her."

The Sultan beckoned to an officer, murmured the simple words, "His head," and fell back among his cushions. This was the reward given for a gallant act in 1873.

The present Sultan, Mulai-Abd-el-Aziz, is about 20 years old, and seems to be the best-hearted and most respectable representative of the long line of Sultans. If he can do even a little to improve the condition of his country, his name will be in better odor than that of any of his predecessors, who have been noted chiefly for cruelty and avarice.

International Prophetic Conference

An important conference convened in Boston, Mass., on Dec. 15, the sessions of which continued until Dec. 17. It was appropriately held in the Clarendon Street Church, which was hallowed by the ministry of the late Dr. Gordon, whose interest in the interpretation of prophecy continued undiminished to the end of his useful life. Like the famous conference of 1878, it was conducted by believers in the Pre-millennial advent of our Lord. Distinguished scholars from Canada and England attended, and compared notes with American divines. We hope to publish an extended account of it soon.

THE CHARIOT RACE FROM BEN HUR

THE CHARIOT RACE

The publishers of Good Housekeeping have recently secured exclusive control of a beautiful reproduction of Checco's masterpiece, THE CHARIOT RACE, which is by common consent one of the strongest and most notable pictures ever printed. The original painting is valued at $50,000, and this is the first reproduction in the original colors; requiring twelve separate and distinct impressions. It is in every particular equal to the artist's copy and the skill and delicacy with which it has been executed command the admiration of the most exacting critic. The subject, which General Lew Wallace has made so well known through his immortal work, "BEN HUR," is the thrilling race scene at the exciting climax of the story. The picture is on heavy plate paper with suitable margin all ready for framing or hanging, and measures 22 by 30 inches.

A WONDERFUL OFFER

To introduce Good Housekeeping into every home where it is not now taken, we will send the magazine for three months upon receipt of only 25 cents in silver or stamps. VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Jan. 22

1. Name the seven passages in the Bible in which the door stands as an emblem of different truths.

2. What event does the Jewish festival of Chanuka commemorate?

3. If a young man of energy, and a middle-aged man of experience were candidates for the pulpit of a church, which of the two would it be better to invite?

4. Which, on the whole, is the greater, the influence of the father or the mother upon the children?

5. Is food (puddings, pies, fruit cakes, etc.) which has wine or any alcoholic liquor put in before cooking, liable, or has it ever been known to arouse in a person a love for strong drink? Would a person who had taken a cure for drink be liable to have the appetite again aroused by eating such things, or is the alcoholic principle destroyed by cooking?

Questions of the Week

1. Who are the "unnamed persons" of the Bible and where are their names to be found?

Among the unnamed persons in the Bible, so far as any clue to their identity can be found from legendary or traditional sources, were these: Jannes and Jambres, the magicians who withstood Moses in Pharaoh's court; Veronica, the woman who touched the hem of Jesus' garment; Ben Ezra, the son of Marianne (sister of Philip the disciple), the lad who held the basket of loaves and fishes; Longinus, the soldier who pierced the Saviour's side, and Dismas and Gestas, the crucified thieves (to the former of whom the promise of Paradise was given). Nearly all of these names are to be found in the apocryphal, "Gospel of Nicodemus."

J. CORCORAN.

2. Is it warmer at any time north of the equator than south of it, and if so what is the cause?

Many Northerners have an erroneous idea concerning the temperature of the southern hemisphere, for not only is it frequently much warmer in the northern than in the southern hemisphere, but the average temperature of the former is also greater. Any isothermal map will show that the thermal equator lies almost wholly north of the geographical equator, while it is also proven by the fact that the ice sheet about the South Pole is much thicker and more extensive than that about the North Pole, so that the nearest approach to the former is more than twice the two hundred and fifty miles which separate us from the latter. The chief reason for this difference in temperature is that over three-fourths of the land lies north of the equator. The seas are the great areas of evaporation, and the continents of rainfall. This difference in the distribution of land and water also gives the greater extremes of temperature north of the equator, for the land both takes up and gives off heat much more rapidly than the water. The inclination of the earth's axis and the elliptical form of the earth's orbit cause a more rapid movement of the earth in our fall and winter as the earth approaches the sun. Hence these two seasons are shortened, while spring and summer are lengthened in the northern, while the reverse is true for the southern hemisphere.

PHILIP F. SCHNEIDER.

Owing to the earth's inclination to the plane of its annual path, its northern hemisphere in summer receives the sun's rays at an angle more nearly perpendicular than that at which they strike the southern hemisphere, while in winter the contrary is true

The greater land area of the northern hemisphere, however, makes its average temperature somewhat higher in the summer months, and, indeed, for the whole year, than that of the southern hemisphere, a given amount of heat increasing the temperature of land much more than that of water. The average in the northern hemisphere for July, its hottest month, is 72.50, while that of the southern hemisphere for January, its hottest month, is only 63.50. By taking the average of the temperatures at various points along individual parallels, it is found that the highest is 80.80, that of the 10th parallel north of the equator. This parallel is therefore the thermal equator, which fact shows, as stated, that the northern hemisphere is warmer, year in and out, on the average, than the southern hemisphere.

3. How did the term "Blue Book," applied to certain Government publications, originate, and what colors do various countries employ in issuing their "Blue Books"?

The practice originated in the English House of Commons, in the year 1681, when disputes ran high on the question of excluding the Duke of York from the succession to the throne. It was stated that false accounts of the transactions were circulated, and as a rule of right; fourth, by example, judicious precept, conscientious decision, consistent Christian character, teach him how to live; fifth, guard well his life from evil associations, and by punishment only as a last resort (and then in a spirit of sorrow), family devotion, and daily intercession at the throne of heaven for him and yourself in training him, he ought to yield to the effective influences of the grace of God and faithful parenthood in a regenerated life and character.

WALTER W. HUBBARD.

The task is a difficult one, something like the almost hopeless task of curing a balky horse. But there is hope with the child, because he has faculties which may be influenced. Care should be taken to avoid irritating the child by too frequent reproof. If the child learns that he cannot come into his mother's presence without being scolded for dirty hands, soiled clothes, muddy shoes, etc., he gets used to scolding, avoids it by keeping out of his mother's way and becomes sullen, and from that to stubbornness is an easy stage. Care should be taken also to avoid an issue of will. The mother says to the child, "Put that chair in its place." The boy does not obey. The mother feels she is set at defiance, and that she must be obeyed. She gets angry and says, "I will make you do it." Perhaps she succeeds by sheer force, but the boy knows that in a few years he will be too big to be overcome in that way, and his bread. I do not see how a true follower of Jesus can keep for his own use, "blood money."

HILIE WALLACE.

In the case supposed, action would have to be governed by the man's own sense of duty. If he has defrauded individuals, he ought to recoup them for the loss they have sustained. If he has no opportunity of doing this, he might devote a large part of his means to certain benevolent schemes, and thus, in a general way, repair so far as he may the evil he has wrought. Yet, in the exercise of moderation and common sense, he need not beggar himself, but retain the means of living. We must not lay too much stress even on good works. Repentance toward God and toward men is the main thing; when that is sincere, all possible and reasonable reparation will be made; and neither God nor man will require more.

JOSEPH HAMILTON.

Miscellaneous Questions

E. H., Calistoga, Calif. Does the Bible give exclusive proof of the age of the world (6,000 years), and must we ignore geological facts?

The Bible chronology (found on the margin of the Book) is not an integral portion of the Bible itself, but represents the computations of Archbishop Ussher (1580-1656).

W. H. G., Claremore, I. T. Is it right for Christian papers to advertise patent medicines?

As our readers know, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD decided, a year ago, to exclude all medical advertisements from its columns, patent medicines included. This is probably a sufficient answer to the above query. We believe, however, that there are some useful and even valuable medicines advertised, but the difficulty of discriminating makes it advisable to exclude all.

Frank A. H., Amherst, N. S. You speak very plainly about dancing, cannot you speak as plainly about card-playing? It is the chief amusement, almost the only one, now indulged in at social gatherings in our town, as much by church members as any.

We have repeatedly discussed card-playing in THE MAIL-BAG. It is in the least harmful sense, a waste of precious time. It leads to gambling, and even if it does not harm the player himself, it may, by his example, lead others to ruin. Cards are the chosen implements of sharpers and gamblers, and should be shunned by those who profess Christian principles.

M. E. A., White Plains, N. Y. Better advertise them for sale.

M. C. R., Phoneton, O. The question was answered in a recent issue.

E. A. M., Saybrook, O. See the article on the planetary conjunction in a recent issue.

D. B. R., Summeytown, Pa. Any good work on physics will give the information you want.

Geo. E. S., Yoakum, Tex. No facts are given from which one may accurately judge of the dimensions of Jericho.

J. C., Edgewater, N. J. For information concerning the King's Daughters, write to Mrs. Dickinson, 156 Fifth ave., New York.

Mrs. J. A. T., Kelley, Ia. No, you are not obliged morally or in any other way to feed those who will not work, but who prefer an idle and aimless life to one of industry and usefulness.

M. B. D., Patterson, N. Y. 1. The devices you mention are employed by so-called astrologists and seers and are in disrepute. Better leave them alone. 2. No, the earliest Christian Gentile church was that formed at Antioch.

Reader, A wife has her legal remedy if a husband drinks so as to render home life miserable and wastes his income. She can enjoin saloon-keepers and others from selling liquor to him. It is assuredly "her business" to take all needful measures to guard the integrity and happiness of the home if he fails to do it.

R. H., Pennsylvania. 1. A lie, or anything "that maketh a lie," is condemned as sin. Thus, an untruth, whether uttered deliberately or in a passion, for gain, for malice, or for no particular purpose, is still a lie, although it may differ in degree from other lies, as being more or less wicked. 2. The right spirit of giving cannot be taught by stimulating generosity by prizes.

Mrs. S. E. H., Innis, La. You must consult your own conscience in the matter. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has frequently stated its position on the subject of dancing, declaring that the ball-room has been the door to ruin for multitudes of young people. The chief danger lies in the facility it affords for promiscuous acquaintance, at an age which is peculiarly susceptible.

Framing the Art Gems

Mrs. C. S. J., Hudson, Mass., writes: "Please accept my thanks. The pictures are fine. Four of them are already framed and are ornaments to our rooms. Your paper is a constant source of pleasure and profit."

What they Think of the Art Portfolio

MIRANDA H. EAMES, Waltham, Mass., writes:

"I knew that you never fail in a single promise made to your patrons, yet I could not imagine all that these pictures were to be and all that they are. Lovely selections! Every one a treasure! THE CHRISTIAN HERALD becomes more and more interesting, if that were possible.

"Now pardon me if I tell you that, in the time from youth until seventy-seven years of age, I have taken many papers and come in contact with many firms; but for probity, methods of exactness and consideration toward patrons, I never saw your equals. You always keep promises. May God bless you and yours."

MR. J. H. DAVIS, Wayne, Pa., writes:

"A few days since, I invested four dollars with you, and for that amount I have received the following means of enjoyment for the coming year:

"1. An annual renewal of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which I have subscribed to with ever-increasing pleasure for many years.

"2. An Art Portfolio of twelve beautiful and helpful pictures, which I have mounted, and will pass on to others for their health and happiness.

"3. A superb copy of the Red Letter Bible, of which I am very proud, and which, in my judgment, is intrinsically worth the entire amount sent you.

"4. Annual subscriptions to two popular and stimulating Monthly Magazines, which will interest and instruct the several members of my household both young and old. And all for four dollars! The anticipated pleasure has already counterbalanced the expenditure. I am glad you are constantly seizing these and other opportunities for distributing health and happiness as the years go by. When the Master calls, you will surely carry home a very large and a very warm heart."

remedy, Sir John Hotham moved that the votes and proceedings of the House be printed. The motion, after discussion, was carried, and the book was printed and bound in blue vellum. The documents printed by the House of Commons accumulated gradually in bulk and variety until they reached their present extent. Some departments of the British House of Commons, however, now issue their proceedings in drab, and some in white covers. The official books of most countries are designated by the color of their covers. The principal are: France, yellow; Germany and Portugal, white; Italy, green; and Spain, red.

4. What is the best method of curing a child of a stubborn disposition?

A stubborn disposition, or unreasonable self-will in a child is a serious defect, and as it is a constitutional trait, cannot be quickly cured, nor will it yield readily to heroic treatment. Severe and harsh measures, far from being a remedy only aggravate the child and intensify the evil nature. The first requisite is a sympathetic and loving disposition and attitude towards the boy; second, impress and convince him of your genuine affection and intense interest in his best welfare; third, do not restrict his conduct unnecessarily, but with utmost candor and sincerity insist upon his plain duty and allow no violation of the stubborn disposition remains and increases. It is better for the mother in such a case, to warn him that disobedience will entail punishment, than to compel an unwilling obedience. But the punishment should not be whipping, but the deprivation of some indulgence of food or play, of which the child is fond. He will thus learn what his stubbornness costs him, and soon arrives at the conclusion that he hurts himself by indulging it. It is important in a cure of that kind that the threatened punishment be rigorously enforced. A stubborn child is rarely, if ever, cured by physical force, or physical punishment, but by tact and affectionate warning.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

5. If a man, who is engaged in a business that is injurious to the public, is converted late in life, should he continue to retain the fortune he made in it, or is he bound to beggar himself by relinquishing all that he possesses?

The law of restitution is taught in both the Old and New Testaments, and when a person is truly converted, he will wish to right every wrong he has committed, as far as possible. If it is impossible to restore to every individual that which has been fraudulently taken from him, the money should be given to the class of individuals he has wronged. For instance, if the fortune has been made in the liquor business, it should be given to the families of his customers, or to aid the temperance cause in some way. If he does this, he can claim God's promises of daily

PATAGONIAN WOMAN AND CHILD

THE SOUTHERNMOST TOWN IN THE WORLD

MISSIONARY OLSSON TELLS OF HIS LONG JOURNEY TO THE PATAGONIAN COAST

SINCE my last letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I have made a long, long journey, and have now reached Punta Arenas, in the Estrecho Magallanes, as the natives call the Straits of Magellan. The town is about 1,400 miles distant from Buenos Ayres. I have spent forty-four days on board the Argentine transport Chaco, and during her voyage we called at the following places on the coast of Patagonia—Madryn, Chubut, Pyramides, Rawson, Camaron, Prada Tilly, Cabo Praso, Sea Bear Bay, Santa Cruz, Rio Gallegos, and lastly, Punta Arenas, Chili.

This has been a hard journey; a part of its trials have been due to cold winds in the Arctic south; others belong to that class which are inseparable from life on board a native vessel. I rejoice to have been permitted to bring the Bible—God's "best missionary"—to the coast of Patagonia; I believe it is the first time God's free Word has been brought hither. Bibles excited much interest and some excitement. The blessed Word stirred many hearts and set people to thinking. Many people became eager to listen to me; and through the message that I had to bring, I became the best known man on board, sought alike by the commander and the cabin-boy. I fully believe that most of the people on board had never seen a copy of the Bible, nor heard the Gospel proclaimed in all their lives before. At one meeting, the men who gathered around me looked more like demons than human beings, while I was preaching to them the wonderful story of salvation through Christ, our Lord. Many seem to be deeply interested, while others mocked; but I was able by grace divine to master the situation, although a difficult one; standing as I did quite alone among this terrible audience as a witness for the Master. Almost every one on board took me for an American for a while, because I was selling American Bibles. Strange what a great part your young country is playing in giving the Gospel to the world! There were some anarchists on board, and the news of your noble President's death was received in different ways. To these disaffected ones, however, I was able to show that the only remedy for all evil is the blessed Gospel of Christ, which is "the power Englishman, at Sea Bear Bay, who spent seventeen years on the coast of Patagonia, said: "You are the first missionary I ever met during my long years in Patagonia." To him and his son, I gave the Word of Life.

This morning, as I write, I can see the snow on the hill above Punta Arenas. This town is said to be the southernmost city in the world. Its history and development make an interesting story. It began its existence as a penal colony in 1851; in spite of convict mutinies and the doubtful character of the settlers, it began to flourish. English farmers from Falkland discovered that pastureage could be found along the coast here, for raising sheep, swine and cattle, so there are some fine ranches in the vicinity. In 1860, the coal mines attracted attention; in 1868, the gold washings of the rivers. The place has now about 4,000 inhabitants, and is the coaling-station for many vessels.

To-morrow, we sail for Tierra del Fuego. To-day, the Pacific steamer, Signaria, on her way from the printed by the American Bible Society, in the Bible House, New York, have now been circulated all along this coast; they have been carried, too, by travelers many hundreds of miles inland right up to the Cordilleras de los Andes (ranges of the Andes). Since we left Buenos Ayres, I have been able by God's help to sell about three boxes of the Holy Scriptures, printed in several languages; the larger number naturally being in Spanish, the tongue chiefly spoken in South America. I hope to dispose of the precious contents of another three boxes which I carry with me, before going North again. How many months I shall be away from home I cannot tell yet. I am glad to think of our mission at Adroque, Buenos Ayres, as conducted by several faithful friends during my absence, and I am thankful, too, for faith's assurance that God's blessing is resting on the work there.

When our steamer, Chaco, left Buenos Ayres on August 31, 1901, we had about 400 people on board, including passengers, sailors, soldiers, and twenty-five prisoners, bound for Tierra del Fuego. Desperate characters were among this crew; I had some horrible thieves and murderers for traveling companions. In truth, mine was a strange congregation of all sorts of conditions of men, at least twelve nationalities finding representation; there was the Chaco Indian, the Gaucho, of Patagonia, and types innumerable besides. To all I have presented the "Oracles of God." The Bibles of God unto salvation to all who believe the message."

After a while I noticed that everywhere on board the men were reading the Scriptures, and many came to thank me for El Libro Precioso (the precious Book). One man said to me: "I like to read your book so much that I would not sell it for any price; when I feel sad, I read the book; and soon after reading it, I feel happy." An

West coast to Liverpool, calls here for mail and passengers. So, time does not permit me to say more about my experiences here; but I hope to write another and longer letter from the ends of the earth—Tierra del Fuego—which I hope will interest the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Ten years ago I started to visit Patagonia overland, but as there was no route open at that time, I only got as far as "Rio Negro," and from thence I crossed the mighty pampas and Andes over to Chile, a long and painful journey, carrying my Bibles with me on horseback, a distance of over 1,000 miles, in forty-seven days traveling. My great journey from Buenos Ayres to the Amazon River completed later, lasted 140 days, during which I was without news from home. The Lord has kept me from all harm through many dangers and trying adventures. "In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in weariness and painfulness," he has been with me.

I send some photographs, which show some of the types of people in wonderful Patagonia who have received the Word of God at my hands. Any readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who may care to aid me in this blessed work of carrying the free Gospel to those who have never had it before, can send contributions for this purpose to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through which due acknowledgment will be made.

TEXT—Luke 2: 16:

"And they came with haste, and found Mary and Joseph, and the Babe Lying in a Manger"

A Christmas Sermon

... By ...

REV. T. DE WITT
TALMAGE, D.D.

THE CITY OF BETHLEHEM, AS IT APPEARS AT THE PRESENT TIME

THE black window-shutters of a December night were thrown open, and some of the best singers of a world where they all sing, stood there, and putting back the drapery of cloud, chanted a peace anthem, until all the echoes of hill and valley applauded and encored the Hallelujah chorus. Come, let us go into that Christmas scene as though we had never before worshipped at the manger. Here is a Madonna worth looking at. I wonder not that the most frequent name in all lands and in all Christian centuries is Mary. And there are Marys in palaces and Marys in cabins, and though German and French and Italian and Spanish and English pronounce it differently, they are all namesakes of the one whom we find on a bed of straw, with her pale face against the soft cheek of Christ in the night of the Nativity. All the great painters have tried, on canvas, to present Mary and her child and the incidents of that most famous night of the world's history. Raphael, in three different masterpieces, celebrated them. Tintoretto and Ghirlandajo surpassed themselves in the adoration of the Magi. Correggio needed to do no more than his Madonna to become immortal. The Madonna of the Lily, by Leonardo da Vinci, will kindle the admiration of all ages. But all the galleries of Dresden are forgotten when I think of the small room of that gallery containing the Sistine Madonna. Yet all of them were copies of St. Matthew's Madonna, and Luke's Madonna, the inspired Madonna of the Old Book, which we had put into our hands when we were infants, and that we hope to have under our heads when we die.

Behold, in the first place, that on the first night of Christ's life God honored the brute creation. You cannot get into that Bethlehem barn without going past the camels, the mules, the dogs, the oxen. The brutes of that stable heard the first cry of the infant Lord. Some of the old painters represent the oxen and camels kneeling that night before the new-born babe. And well might they kneel! Have you ever thought that Christ came, among other things, to alleviate the sufferings of the brute creation? Was it not appropriate that he should, during the first few days and nights of his life on earth, be surrounded by the dumb beasts, whose moan and plaint and bellowing have for ages been a prayer to God for the arresting of their tortures and the righting of their wrongs? Not a kennel in all the centuries, not a bird's nest, not a worn-out horse on tow-path, not a herd freezing in the poorly-built cow-pen, not a freight car in summer time bringing the beeves to market without water through a thousand miles of agony, not a surgeon's room witnessing the struggles of fox, or rabbit, or pigeon, or dog, in the horrors of vivisection, but has an interest in the fact that Christ was born in a stable,

Surrounded by Brutes

Standing then, as I imagine now I do, in that Bethlehem night with an infant Christ on the one side and the speechless creatures of God on the other, I cry, look out, how you strike the rowel into that horse's side. Take off that curbed bit from that bleeding mouth. Remove that saddle from that raw back. Shoot not for fun that bird that is too small for food. Forget not to put water into the cage of that canary. Throw out some crumbs to those birds caught too far north in the winter's inclemency. Arrest that man who is making that one horse draw a load heavy enough for three. Rush in upon that scene where boys are torturing a cat, or transfixing butterfly and grasshopper. Drive not off that old robin, for her nest is a mother's cradle, and under her wing there may be three or four musicians of the sky in training. In your families and in your schools, teach the coming generation more mercy than the present generation has ever shown, and in this marvelous Bible picture of the Nativity, while you point out to them the angel, show them also the camel, and while they hear the celestial chant, let them also hear the cow's moan.

Behold, also, in this Bible scene, how, on that Christmas night, God honored childhood. Childhood was to be honored by that advent. He must have a child's light limbs, and a child's dimpled hand, and a child's beaming eye, and a child's flaxen hair; and babyhood was to be honored for all time to come, and a cradle was to mean more than a grave. Mighty God! May the reflection of that one child's face be seen in all infantile faces.

Enough have all those fathers and mothers on hand if they have a child in the house. A throne, a crown, a sceptre, a kingdom, under charge. Be careful how you strike him across the head, jarring the brain. What you say to him will be centennial and millennial, and a hundred years and a thousand years will not stop the echo and re-echo. Do not say, "It is only a child." Rather say, "It is only an immortal." It is only a masterpiece of Jehovah. It is only a being that shall outlive sun and moon and star, and ages quadrilennial. God has infinite resources, and he can give presents of great value, but when he wants to give the richest possible gift to a household, he looks around all the worlds and all the universe and then gives a child. Yea, in all ages God has honored childhood. He makes almost every picture a failure unless there be a child either playing on the floor, or looking through the window, or seated on the lap, gazing into the face of the mother.

God Honors Children

It was a child in Naaman's kitchen that told the great Syrian warrior where he might go and get cured of the leprosy, which at his seventh plunge in the Jordan, was left at the bottom of the river. It was to the cradle of leaves, in which a child was laid, rocked by the Nile, that God called the attention of history. It was a sick child that evoked Christ's curative sympathies. It was a child that Christ set in the midst of the squabbling disciples, to teach the lesson of humility. A child decided Waterloo, showing the army of Blucher how they could take a short cut through the fields, when, if the old road had been followed, the Prussian general would have come up too late to save the destinies of Europe. It was a child that decided Gettysburg, he having overheard two Confederate generals in a conversation, in which they decided to march for Gettysburg instead of Harrisburg; and this, reported to Governor Curtin, the Federal forces started to meet their opponents at Gettysburg. And to-day the child is to decide all the great battles, make all the laws, settle all the destinies, and usher in the world's salvation or destruction. Men, women, nations, all earth and all heaven, behold the child!

Notice also that in this Bible night scene God honored science. Who are the three wise men kneeling before the Divine Infant? Not boors, not ignoramuses, but Caspar, Balthasar and Melchior, men who knew all that was to be known. They were the Isaac Newtons and Herschels and Faradays of their time. Their alchemy was the forerunner of our sublime chemistry, their astrology the mother of our magnificent astronomy. And when I see these scientists bowing before the beautiful babe, I see the prophecy of the time when all the telescopes and microscopes, and all the Leyden jars, and all the electric batteries, and all the observatories, and all the universities shall bow to Jesus. It is much that way already. Where is the college that does not have morning prayers, thus Bowing at the Manger?

Who have been the greatest physicians? Omitting the names of the living lest we should be invidious, have we not had among them Christian men like James Y. Simpson and Rush and Valentine Mott and Abercrombie and Abernethy? Who have been our greatest scientists? Joseph Henry, who lived and died in the faith of the Gospels, and Agassiz, who, standing with his students among the hills, took off his hat and said, "Young gentlemen, before we study these rocks, let us pray for wisdom to the God who made the rocks." All geology will yet bow before the Rock of Ages. All botany will yet worship the Rose of Sharon. All astronomy will yet recognize the Star of Bethlehem.

Behold also in that first Christmas night that God honored the fields. Come in, shepherd boys, to Bethlehem and see the child. "No," they say, "we are not dressed good enough to come in." "Yes, you are; come in." Sure enough, the storms and the night dew and the brambles have made rough work with their apparel, but none have a better right to come in. They were the first to hear the music of that Christmas night. The first announcement of a Saviour's birth was made to those men in the fields. There were wiseacres that night in Bethlehem and Jerusalem snoring in deep sleep, and there were salaried officers of government, who, hearing of it afterward, may have thought that they ought to have had the first news of such a great event, some one dismounting from a swift camel at their door and knocking till, at some sentinel's question, "Who comes there?" the great ones of the palace might have been told of the celestial arrival. No; the shepherds heard the music, the first in the major key and the last in the subdued minor: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men." Ah, yes, the fields were honored.

Leaders from the Fields

The old shepherds with plaid and crook have for the most part vanished; but we have grazing—on our United States pasture fields and prairie, about forty-two million sheep—and all their keepers ought to follow the shepherds of my text, and all those who toil in fields, all vine-dressers, all orchardists, all husbandmen. Not only that Christmas night, but all up and down the world's history, God has been honoring the fields. Nearly all the messiahs of reform, and literature, and eloquence, and law, and benevolence, have come from the fields. Washington from the fields. Jefferson from the fields. The Presidential martyrs, Garfield, and Lincoln, and McKinley, from the fields. Henry Clay from the fields. Daniel Webster from the fields. Martin Luther from the fields. Before this world is right, the overflowing populations of our crowded cities will have to take to the fields. Instead of ten merchants in rivalry as to who shall sell that one apple, we want at least eight of them to go out and raise apples. Instead of ten merchants desiring to sell that one bushel of wheat, we want at least eight of them to go out and raise wheat. The world wants now more hard hands, more bronzed cheeks, more muscular arms. To the fields! God honored them when he woke up the shepherds by the midnight anthem, and he will, while the world lasts, continue to honor the fields. When the shepherd's crook was that famous night stood against the wall of the Bethlehem khan, it was a prophecy of the time when thresher's flail, and farmer's plough, and woodman's axe, and ox's yoke, and sheaf-binder's rake, shall surrender to the God who made the country, as man made the town.

Consecrated Motherhood

Behold, also, that on that Christmas night God honored motherhood. Two angels on their wings might have brought an infant Saviour to Bethlehem without Mary's being there at all. When the villagers, on the morning of December 26, awoke, by divine arrangement, and in some unexplained way, the child Jesus might have been found in some comfortable cradle of the village. But no, no! Motherhood for all time was to be consecrated, and one of the tenderest relations was to be the maternal relation, and one of the sweetest words, "mother." In all ages God has honored good motherhood. John Wesley had a good mother; St. Bernard had a good mother; Samuel Budgett, a good mother; Doddridge, a good mother; Walter Scott, a good mother; Benjamin West, a good mother. In a great audience, most of whom were Christians, I asked that all those who had been blessed of Christian mothers, arise, and almost the entire assembly stood up. Do you not see how important it is that all motherhood be consecrated? Why did Titian, the Italian artist, when he sketched the Madonna, make it an Italian face? Why did Rubens, the German artist, in his Madonna, make it a German face? Why did Joshua Reynolds, the English artist, in his Madonna, make it an English face? Why did Murillo, the Spanish artist, in his Madonna, make it a Spanish face? I never heard; but I think they took their own mothers as the type of Mary, the mother of Christ. When you hear some one, in sermon or oration, speak in the abstract of a good, faithful, honest mother, your eyes fill up with tears, while you say to yourself, "that was my mother."

The first word a child utters is apt to be "Mother" and the old man, in his dying dream, calls, "Mother! Mother!" It matters not whether she was brought up in the surroundings of a city, and in affluent home, and was dressed appropriately, with reference to the demands

"THE FATHER OF PHONOGRAPHY"

Sir Isaac Pitman and the Influence of his Invention on the World's History --- Our Phonographic Course on January 8, 1902, the first lesson of a complete course of shorthand in the Isaac Pitman system, a brief sketch of the life and work of the famous "Father of Phonography," will be read with interest.

Isaac Pitman was born on January 4, 1813, at Trowbridge, Wiltshire, England. He attended the grammar school of that town, but left at the early age of twelve and became a clerk in the counting-house of a cloth manufacturer, where his father was manager. After six years' service, he was sent to be trained in the Normal College of the British and Foreign School Society of London. He was afterward appointed master of a school of Barton-on-Humber, and subsequently established a school at Wotton-under-Edge. It was at the latter place that he first turned his attention to shorthand, and published his Stenographic Sound Hand in 1837. In 1842 he brought out the Phonetic Journal, which was edited by him for over fifty years, and in the following year established the Phonographic Institute. Besides printing his own instruction books for teaching shorthand, he issued a library of over one hundred volumes, printed entirely in shorthand.

In 1894, when he was eighty-one years of age, his life labors were officially recognized by the honor of knighthood, conferred by Queen Victoria, for the services he had rendered to the nation by the invention of phonography. Sir Isaac Pitman died January 22, 1897.

The ability to write shorthand is coming to be more and more an absolutely necessary clerical qualification for young men and women in every station of life. The very nature of the work places them in close confidential business relations with merchants, financiers, capitalists, and business people generally. In a multitude of cases, shorthand has proved the stepping-stone to very lucrative and desirable positions. A good stenographer need never want employment, as every business house employs one or more and the demand for the really capable will always exceed the supply. Charles Reade said in The Coming Man, "I advise all parents to have their boys and girls taught shorthand. A stenographer who can typewrite his notes would be far safer from poverty than a Greek scholar."

The Rev. Thomas Hill, ex-president of Harvard, said, "I consider the art one of the most valuable inventions of our prolific day. It should be taught in the common schools as one of the best possible aids in obtaining a subsequent education." A report of the United States Civil Service Commission says, "The supply of male eligibles in stenography and typewriting is barely equal to the demand, and the prospects of promotion after appointment from this register are better than after appointment from the other registers. Of the thirty-nine competitors who passed, thirty-five were appointed, at salaries ranging from $50 to $100 per month." The profession of court and general reporting is a very profitable one.

Of all the shorthand systems, the Isaac Pitman is the best for all practical purposes, being the simplest and most natural, the most harmonious, logical and legible. This system has been chosen for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's course of shorthand lessons.

New York, with whom a special arrangement has been made to conduct these lessons), the new Twentieth Century revision of this standard system, which has never before appeared in any magazine or periodical.

Isaac Pitman's phonography was not only the first invented, but it is the latest improved. It is now written by about 94 per cent. of all the official court reporters in English-speaking countries. The Isaac Pitman system has stood the test of over sixty years of actual practice, and where rightly taught, has never been found wanting. The time and money necessary to acquire the mastery of a good shorthand system are always well spent. In the present instance, however, the extraordinary opportunity is offered to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers—and especially to the young men and women who are looking forward to an active, self-supporting career—to acquire a thorough practical knowledge of this best of all shorthand systems absolutely free of cost. The first lesson of the course will appear in our issue of January 8, 1902, and these lessons will be published twice a month throughout the year, the entire course being completed in thirty lessons.

Pitman's system is taught in the High Schools of New York City, Brooklyn, and other large American cities, and in hundreds of representative business colleges throughout the country. It is also the system taught in the Canadian schools.

The benefits of this remarkable "campaign of education" should be extended as widely as possible. There are many thousands of men and women who will welcome it with enthusiasm. Ordinarily, such a course would involve considerable outlay, but it is now open to every one for the mere cost of a subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Tell your friends about it, and show them that it will be to their advantage to subscribe at once, that they may be able to take the lessons from the beginning. This course will mean—especially with those just starting out in life—the most valuable equipment they could receive for self-support. Every lesson will be clear, self-explanatory and sufficiently simple to be understood by the youngest student. Step by step, under the ablest of teachers, the learners will be taken through the most fascinating of studies until they are able to write the "Correspondence Style" used in law offices, mercantile houses and business firms generally.

Send in your subscription now, and begin with us at the very first lesson of the course.

The Recent Assembly of Expositors of Prophecy
From Europe and America, in Boston, Mass.....

SPEAKERS AT THE RECENT PROPHETIC CONFERENCE IN BOSTON, MASS.

"It would be better to call it a Bible Conference, or a Conference for the study of the Bible," said A. C. Dixon, in his address at the opening of the Prophetic Conference, held in Boston from the tenth to the fifteenth of December, in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church.

The recent Conference was entirely undenominational in character, and it called together a larger and more diversified number of speakers than any Conference yet held. It was under the direction of a committee consisting of Rev. A. C. Dixon, Rev. Emory Hunt, pastor of the Clarendon Street Church, who has recently assumed the duties of President of Denison University, one of the most important educational institutions in Granville, Ohio. Other members of the committee are the Rev. J. D. Herr and Mr. J. F. Lockwood.

Among the speakers was the Rev. Sholto Douglass, M.A., of Scotland, who came to America for the express purpose of speaking at the Conference. Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B., LL.D., author of The Silence of God, was not able to be present in person, but he sent a most interesting paper under the title of "The Principal Aim of a Prophetic Conference," which was read by Dr. Herr, of Norwich, Connecticut.

Prof. D. S. Margoliouth, M.A., of Oxford, could not be present on account of illness, but he sent an address entitled "The Pre-eminence of the Lord's Coming in the Bible."

Another prominent Englishman, and one not a stranger in America, was the Rev. Henry Varley, who gave several addresses.

The Conference opened on the afternoon of Tuesday, December tenth, with a meeting for prayer, led by Mr. William Phillips Hall, of New York City. In the evening there was a very large audience to listen to an address of welcome by the Rev. Emory W. Hunt. The response was by the Rev. A. C. Dixon, President of the Conference.

On Wednesday afternoon the meeting was in charge of Mr. H. W. Frost, the American director of the China Inland Mission. Sir Robert Anderson's paper was read, and there was an address by Rev. Henry Varley.

In the evening, Prof. D. S. Margoliouth's paper on "The Integrity of the Scriptures" was read, and there was an address by the Rev. Sholto Douglass, in which he spoke of the prophecies relating to the second coming of Christ. Mr. Douglass believes in a literal interpretation of the prophecies and is of the opinion that these prophecies point to the pre-millennial advent of Christ, which he believes to be near.

On Thursday there was an address by the Rev. James

Gray, D.D., author of Synthetic Study of the Bible, his subject being, "The Harmony of the Old Testament Prophecies with Respect to the Coming Crisis." Following this address, Rev. I. C. Scofield gave an address, "The Signs of the Nearness of the Lord's Coming."

The evening session was very largely attended, the opening praise service being conducted by Mr. H. M. Moore, one of Boston's most consecrated laymen. Then came an address by the Rev. Elmore Harris, D.D., his topic being "The Resurrections and the Judgments."

The principal address of the evening was by the Rev. Sholto Douglass, who spoke with great power on the subject of prophecy, the address being one of the most remarkable addresses of the entire Conference.

Dr. Douglass has made a life-long study of the subject of Bible prophecy, and his convictions are based on this study. He pointed out with much force the events in the history of various nations during the past decade, which might be regarded as fulfillment of prophecy, and showed how the movements of the time, in society and in government, were all tending toward the great consummation which Christ described as developing immediately before his return. We hope to publish a report of his address soon.

AUNT HETTY'S CHRISTMAS STORY

By ERNEST GILMORE

WE lived in western Kansas—almost upon the border of Colorado, she said, and I do not think you could imagine the barren wastes that our plains were for years. Ah, me! Ah, me! It is a wonder we lived through those dreary years. But there came a beautiful springtime at last, after a terrible winter of hunger and bitter cold. Mother wasn't really old as far as years went, but hard work and anxiety had worn upon her. She and father had been pioneers—had come from the East in a big emigrant wagon soon after their marriage. There were buffaloes then trampling over the ground where father built a log cabin later. Mother said it took her a long time to get accustomed to her prairie home. Poor mother! Looking backward I doubt that she ever became used to it. She said that she and the wild winds would often sing requiems together when father was off on the prairie to work and she alone—it wasn't so lonely after the first year, for then I was born. Two years later, my only brother—little Paul, was born. The other children came two years apart until there were six of us—all girls except Paul.

When I was twelve years old and Paul ten—he died. Mother was broken-hearted, so was father, I think, but they kept on with their work the same as of old. As for myself the world grew dark to me when Paul died. There was never another boy like Paul on God's earth—I'm sure of it. His eyes were the hue of God's blue sky when the sky is bluest. His hair was tinged with the glow of sunshine. He was the life of our home—the brightest star. No wonder it grew dark when that star was transplanted—went out from us to shine in heaven.

But life went on outwardly in the same old way. There was always the spring planting, but, alas! not always the harvesting. Sometimes the grasshoppers destroyed the crops, sometimes the chinch bugs, often there were other causes. Whenever there was a real harvest-home, we had a Thanksgiving and a Christmas feast. By the time I was fourteen years old, father had built us a comfortable frame-house. The log cabin was now used as a barn. We had very little furniture in the new home.

"When we get ahead a little," mother said, "we'll first buy a headstone for dear Paul's grave, and afterward we'll buy some furniture for our house." There came a beautiful springtime after a terrible winter of hunger and bitter cold, of hardships and dangers.

Oh, that beautiful springtime! I shall never forget it—never. As for mother, she seemed to grow young again, in fact she did grow young. Why shouldn't one really grow young for joy as well as grow old for sorrow? I was sixteen years old that spring. On my birthday morning, mother said smilingly, "We'll celebrate, Hetty, we'll be girls together." What a day that was! What a glorious day! We did not have a surfeit of provisions in the house, but we made the best of what there was and were grateful. After the midday dinner was out of the way, I had a delightful surprise. Mother unlocked a chest and took out something carefully folded in a towel. She told me to run along out of doors with the children—she would follow soon. Presently some one came out, I couldn't tell who at first. The one who came dancing out of the house wore a white dress, low in the neck and short-sleeved, revealing a pretty neck and arms. There were curls falling upon her shoulders. She came up to me and kissed me, first on one cheek then on the other and on my lips, after which she put her arms around me.

"We'll be girls together," she said.

"Oh, mother!" I cried out, "how pretty you are!"

"Am I?" she said; a faint rose coming into her cheeks, "I'm glad you think so. I wore this dress for the first time the day I was sixteen. It was a tight squeeze for me to get into it to-day. I'll take it off presently and give it to you to have and to hold."

Oh, the balminess of that summer day!

It was just as mother had asserted—we were "girls together."

But the corn was young then, and we were hopeful. Mother's heart was so light that there crept into her sweet eyes a wonderful radiance that reminded me of Paul.

The summer passed on—the most beautiful one I had ever known. Mother grew more jubilant day by day. The corn grew steadily without one set-back. We children played hide-and-seek among the rustling corn stalks. Mother often joined us in the game after the corn grew higher than her head.

Ah, how gently the wind blew over us! How mother enjoyed watching the beautiful corn-fields! How we all did! How the silky golden tassels danced in the balmy breeze! How good God was to give us such a promise of an abundant harvest!

But how can any one read the "next day"?

There was a sudden change which brought disaster. We awoke one morning feeling strangely weak and depressed. It was almost insufferably hot at break of day. When the sun arose it was like a blazing furnace. The wind arose with a shriek, bringing a scorching blast that nothing could her knees first. The dreams had passed away—Paul's headstone and the new furniture. The light of victory cast its glow over mother's pale face that morning. It was just at break of day that we gathered around our breakfast table.

"I've thought it all over," said mother, with a smile that seemed heavenly, "and I feel better than I did."

"I don't see why you feel better," was father's dismal response.

"Well, you see," she continued, "it was our work to plant and hoe and water—we did our work well. We did what we could. That we gathered no harvest was not our fault. It must have been God's will."

"Hard lines for us," muttered father.

"Yes," mother admitted, "but you know, David, dear, that 'behind a frowning Providence God hides a smiling face.'"

Father looked as if he doubted the statement, but mother went on in a comforting way.

"We forgot to read our 'Book of Mercies' when the corn fell."

"There's nothing to read—it's a blank," father said despairingly.

"Oh," mother continued with a rare smile, "I find no difficulty in reading. We are all spared—not one break in six years—not since darling Paul died. How good and merciful God has been to us! We are all well. We have a comfortable house."

"Not much in it," I interrupted.

"The furniture will come—God willing," said mother; "we'll wait as patiently as we can. We have a shed full of logs and split wood enough to keep us through the coming winter no matter how bitterly cold the weather may be."

"How about clothing and provisions?" asked father, in a masterful way, "you don't find any mention of such things in your 'Book of Mercies,' do you?"

"Ah, but I do," her face glowing, "I find in my 'Book of Mercies' that thus far nakedness and hunger have never been our portion, and, as for the remainder of the way—I can and will trust my dear Father in heaven."

I shall always carry mother's picture in my heart, as she looked then. Father's lips quivered and then his face caught the glow from hers. He got up slowly from his chair, went to mother and kissed her.

"Dear heart," he said, "I've learned your lesson; henceforth I'll read the 'Book of Mercies' too."

After that, notwithstanding our great loss, our days were peaceful. The days went by, father got things, as far as possible, ready for winter. But as Christmas Day drew near, the way looked exceedingly gloomy. There was no money. Our clothing was very thin and worn. Our provisions were low. Mother, however, kept up her spirits and cheered us all.

"We haven't starved yet," she said one morning after we had eaten the last food in the house, "and we'll put a fence of trust around to-day."

"Do you expect the ravens to feed us?" father asked.

She smiled.

"In some way or other the Lord will provide," she said.

Noontime came and passed. There was no dinner—of course. The short afternoon had passed away. Little Ruth, the youngest, was crying for supper.

"We are like an omnibus," said father despairingly, "there is always room for one more; this time it is starvation. Your ravens didn't come, mother, eh?"

"Have patience," said mother sweetly and calmly, "we had something to eat this morning—there is no danger of starvation yet. God, who watches over Israel, neither slumbers nor sleeps. He has heard our prayers as the days have gone by."

She took Ruth on her lap, and rocked her until she fell asleep on her breast. Suddenly there was a sound outside that made us all leap to our feet. Had someone lost his way? Or was help coming in our extremity? The sound came nearer—surely, it was a horse's hoofs grinding the thick snow crust. We ran to the door. A horse was floundering in the snow. Father ran to the rescue.

"Helloa!" cried someone, muffled up to the ears in furs, "can you give supper and a shelter to a tired tramp?"

The horse was cared for, and the traveler brought into the fire, which—thank God—was burning brightly. Mother and I were helping our guest remove his wraps (for his withstand. It writhed and hissed like a serpent and stung as cruelly as the most venomous serpent could.

The dear corn made a brave fight for life but there was no hope. Before the close of the second day—all was over. The beautiful corn-fields had vanished—left behind was one big grave—scorched and blackened. To us it was an appalling calamity.

Mother drooped like a delicate flower touched with the frost. Poor mother! Her "castles in the air" had been blown down with a breath. Her "ship" which had been coming over joy-laden had sunk at sea. Oh, it was sad, sad! Father was crushed, too, in fact he seemed to have lost all hope. He would sit for hours on the porch—his elbows on his knees with his chin resting on his clinched hands and his eyes looking far away as if he were questioning the why and wherefore of the calamity that had come to us. Mother was the first to revive. Blessed mother! She had fought her battle and won. I think she had spent a whole night on

THE JOYS OF CHRISTMAS

By T. De Witt Talmage D.D.

SONGS greeted the birth of our Saviour. Angelic tongues with living fire sang the incarnation as they hovered over the hills of Judea. The music was resonant with joy. From the hour that the virgin laid her babe on pillow of straw in the manger, all Christendom has since that time made the anniversary of this Natal Day a season of gladness—a season of unbounded joy!

OLD RELIGIONS REIGNED

Wreath the laurel, twine the bay,
Christ was born on Christmas day—

There were special seasons for these heavenly songs being sung by the celestial chorus, for there was joy in God's great heart—joy among the first-born sons of light, joy thrilling all the heavenly empire,—joy that is yet to be put in the new song sung by redeemed millions around the throne of "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

It was the music of Liberty. When these heavenly hosts sang their Gloria in Excelsis the whole world was resting under galling yokes of oppression. Slavery was universal. Taskmasters were everywhere severe to those in servitude. Greece, Rome, and Palestine heard daily the groans of those in bondage. The world was in chains. But the song of the angels rang the death knell of bondage. The babe was God's emancipation. His distinctive mission was to set at liberty the captives and proclaim deliverance to the bruised and crushed sons of toil. Under the mild and genial influence of our holy Christianity, fetters fall off everywhere, until now in this morning of our new century there are few nations to be found that hold serfs. Glorious freedom! Triumphant achievement of the Cross, wherever it is lifted chains are broken and spiritual emancipation is proclaimed.

It was the music of Hope. Until Jesus appeared all the ancient religions had offered only a message of despair. No light fell upon the grave, or illumined the vast beyond. Darkness reigned in supreme, sullen majesty, and not a single star of hope gilded the future. The grave was an eternal prison. But the songs sung by the heavenly choristers on that eventful night heralded hope to a lost world. Into the soul of sinning humanity came the sweet rays of joy, and peace and blessedness, and looking down into the grave all fear had vanished, for sin, the sting of death was gone, and cancelled by a glorious Christ the Lord. They looked and beheld—

On the cold cheek of death smiles and roses are blending,
And beauty immortal awakes from the tomb.

And this is our Christmas joy that Jesus has lifted into immortal hope the graves of all our beloved friends who sleep in him.

It was the music of Victory. When Jesus came the great mass of humanity were in serfdom and the dignity of labor was not comprehended. Toil was regarded as a degradation. Laborers were despised, and all forms of manual industry held to be a disgrace. But the Son of Mary and Joseph came to teach the world a new philosophy, and by honorable industry he proclaimed the dignity of labor, and taught that

The honest man tho' eye see poor
Is king of men for a' that.—

Jesus counts the beads of sweat upon the brow of every son of toil. He notes all injustice done the laboring classes—and only as his spirit prevails among men will the great conflict between labor and capital cease. But that day is coming ere long—the glad Christmas of the ages—

When man to man the wide world o'er Shall brothers be and a' that.

It was the music of complete Redemption. The fidelity and false science never whispered, that joy and peace flowing from a full pardon of sin was possible for all men when the song of songs was sung—"To you is born in the City of David a Saviour, Christ the Lord."

Christianity is a religion of song. Agnosticism has no gloria. Confucianism and Brahmanism have no inspiring anthems or soulful hallelujahs. Dreary, weird dirges reveal no glad hope for the present or future to heathen nations. Moral melodies are generated the instant Christ is known, for his love is the source and soul of praise. Faith in Jesus awakens gladness and creates a freeness, fulness, and depth of songfulness that the great question with a believer is "How can I keep from singing?" Christian hope gives birth to a great uplift of cheerful optimism. Christ leads the world's great orchestras to-day, for every soul he has redeemed rejoices in a hope of glory. The believer's face is radiant with gladness, and his speech inevitably flows into chants, anthems and glorious melodies. Where false religions have any music it is generally found to be what one has most truthfully called "plagiarized praise."

The cruel taunt of infidelity that "the religion of Jesus is only for the mournful, defeated and disconsolate" has been disproved, for Christianity is jubilant, and has given to the world the sublimest oratorios, which are peerless in their militant spirit and hope of triumphal conquest. The literature of to-day is full of sweet lyrics, and the Christian musicians, the masters of sacred song the world over, are endeavoring to lay fresh laurels around the cradle of the infant Redeemer. Paganism is bankrupt of poetry; scepticism is songless; materialism knows nothing of soul-stirring melodies. But when Jesus was born in Bethlehem and was incarnated, he put into the heart of humanity musical vibrations that will never cease, but roll out their harmonies long after

The sun grows cold, and the stars grow old,
And the leaves of the judgment book unfold.

Ring out your songs of praise to our infant King, for his sceptre shall soon be swayed over all the world, in that promised "age of gold."

When peace shall over all the earth
Its final splendors fling,
And the whole world send back the song
Which now the angels sing!

value of the human soul, the infinite greatness of man as an heir to immortality had not dawned on the conception of the world before the song of the angels was sung above Judea's hills. The incarnation meant the redemption of the individual man—regenerating the heart, and elevating him to communion with God, and companionship with the angels. It links earth to heaven, and proclaims what scepticism, agnosticism, in-

of modern life, or whether she wore the old-time cap, and great round spectacles, and apron of her own make, and knit your socks with her own needles, seated by the broad fireplace, with great back log ablaze, on a winter night. It matters not how many wrinkles crossed and recrossed her face, or how much her shoulders stooped with the burdens of a long life, if you painted a Madonna, hers would be the face. What a gentle hand she had when we were sick, and what a voice to soothe pain, and was there any one who could so fill up a room with peace, and purity, and light? And what a sad day that was when we came home and she could greet us not, for her lips were forever still. Come back mother, in these Christmas times, and take your old place, and as ten, or twenty, or fifty years ago, come and open the old Bible as you used to: read and kneel in the same place where you used to pray, and look upon us, as of old when you wished us a Merry Christmas or a Happy New Year. But, no! That would not be fair to call you back. You had troubles enough, and aches enough, and bereavements enough while you were here. Tarry by the throne, mother, till we join you there, your prayers all answered, and in the eternal homestead of our God we shall again keep Christmas jubilee together. But speak from your thrones, all you glorified mothers, and say to all these, your sons and daughters, words of love, words of warning, words of cheer. They need your voice, for they have traveled far and with many a heart-break since you left them, and you do well to call from the heights of heaven to the valleys of earth. Hail, enthroned ancestry! We are coming. Keep a place right beside you at the banquet.

Slow-footed years! More swiftly run
Into the gold of that unsetting sun.
Homesick we are for thee,
Calm land beyond the sea.

Christmas

BRIGHT Christmas morning of my soul's delight. Chime all the bells. Wreath all the garlands. Rouse all the anthems. Shake hands in all the congratulations. Merry Christmas! Merry with the thought of sins forgiven, merry with the idea of sorrows comforted, merry with the raptures to come. Oh! lift that Christ from the manger, and lay him down in all our hearts. We may not bring to him as costly a present as the Magi brought, but we bring to his feet and to the manger to-day the frankincense of our joy, the pearls of our tears, the kiss of our love, the prostration of our worship. Down at his feet, all churches, all ages, all earth, all heaven! Down all worlds at his feet, and worship. "Glory to God, in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men!"

What an awful subtraction from the world's brightness would have been the making of December twenty-fifth like other days of the year! Glorious day! After brightening England and Holland and Germany for centuries, it stepped across the sea, and pronounced its benediction on our shores. Why, we never get over the Christmases of our childhood! Father and mother joined in them. They forgot their rheumatisms and shortness of breath, and for a while threw off the sorrows of a lifetime, while they struggled with us as to who should first in the morning shout the "Merry Christmas!" Then, there were all the innocent mysteries as to who brought the presents, and the wonderment as to how sleighs drawn by reindeer could come down the perpendicular, and afterward, the disappointment, as some older brother or sister, with all the pride of discovery, tried to persuade us that the chimney had not been the channel of generous descent. Oh, what times they were, the Christmases of our boyhood and girlhood days! We still feel in our pulses some of the exuberance which we then unwittingly stored up for future times, when the eye might lose some of its lustre, and the foot some of its spring, and the heart some of its rebound.

How the holly and rosemary and ivy and mistletoe looked, interwoven! The Puritans may not have liked the day, and John Calvin may have pronounced it superstitious, and feared it would bring into religious observance the Saturnalia of the heathen; the decorations of ivy inappropriate, because ivy had been dedicated to Bacchus, and mistletoe inappropriate, because mistletoe had been associated with Druidical rites; but we testify that Christmas never did us any harm, and the only objection we ever expressed was that it was so long a time from Christmas to Christmas. Ecclesiastical controversy as to whether it ought to be celebrated on the sixth of January or twenty-ninth of March or twenty-ninth of September or twenty-fifth of December did not bother us then any more than it bothers us now. It always came at the right time, although a little late, and now we realize that Christmas comes opportunely, just after the shortest day of the year, December twenty-first, and at the time when days are lengthening and the sun is recommencing its upward course, telling us that spring and summer are coming. Oh, what a forest of Christmas trees—trees bearing twelve manner of fruits—now standing throughout the households of Christendom! Oh, what hosannas are ascending on this day, the Christmas of a Saviour's birth, this year blending with the Sabbath of a Saviour's resurrection!

Let the Christmas table be spread. Let it be an extension table made up of the tables of your households, and added to them the tables of celestial festivity, all together making a table long enough to reach across a hemisphere, yea long enough to reach from earth to heaven. Send out the invitations to all the guests whom we would like to have come and dine. Come, all the ransomed of earth and all the crowned of heaven. As at ancient banquets the king who was to preside came in after all the guests had taken their places at the table, so perhaps it may be now. Let the old folks who sat at each end of your Christmas table ten or twenty or forty years ago be seated, their aches and pains all gone; behold, they sit down in the exhilaration of everlasting youth!

Come, brothers and sisters who used to retire with us early on Christmas eve so that the mysteries of bestowed gifts might be kept secret, and who rose with us early on Christmas morn to see what was to be revealed. Come, all the old neighbors of our boyhood and girlhood days who used to happen in toward the close of this day to wish us a merry time. Come, all the ministers of Christ who have in pulpits for many a year been telling the story of the star that pointed to the world's first Christmas gift, and at the same time wakened Herod's apprehensions. Come and sit down, ye heralds of "the glad tidings," whether you were sprinkled or plunged, whether your thanks to-day be offered in liturgy of ages or prayers spontaneous, whether you be gowned in canonicals or wearing plain coat of backwoods meeting-house. Come in! Room at this Christmas table for all those who have bowed at the manger in whatever world you now live.

To the Aged

DO not be fretted because you have to come to spectacles. While glasses look premature on a young man's nose, they are an adornment on an octogenarian's face. Besides that, when your eyesight is poor, you miss seeing a great many unpleasant things that youngsters are obliged to look at. Do not be worried because your ear is becoming dull. In that way you escape being bored with many of the foolish things that are said. If the gates of sound keep out some of the music, they also keep out much of the discord. If the hair be getting thin, it takes less time to comb it, and then it is not all the time falling down over your eyes; or if it be getting white, I think that color is quite as respectable as any other; that is the color of the snow, and of the blossoms, and of the clouds, and of angelic habiliments.

Do not worry because the time comes on when you must go into the next world. It is only a better room, with finer pictures, brighter society, and sweeter music. Robert McCheyne, and John Knox, and Harriet Newell, and Mrs. Hemans, and John Milton, and Martin Luther will be good enough company for the most of us. The corn-shocks standing in the fields in autumn do not sigh dismally when the huskers leap over the fence, and, throwing their arms around the stack, swing it to the ground. It is only to take the golden ear from the husk.

Death to the aged Christian is only husking-time, and then the load goes in from the frost to the garner. Congratulations to those who are nearly done with the nuisances of this world. Give your staff to your little grandson to ride horse on. You are to be young again, and will not need crutches.

The Lesson of Prosperity

WE have turned a new page in our nation's career. God tried us with financial panic, tried us with war, tried us with grasshoppers, tried us with locusts, tried us with droughts, tried us with freshets, tried us with yellow fever. Now he is giving the severest test of a nation's righteousness. He is trying us with commercial, agricultural, manufacturing and literary prosperity. To the page of prosperity, what shall be the sequence? Will it be gratitude, or disruption? Will it be elevation, or degradation? Will it be more light, or more darkness? Some ascribe all the correction of our national finances to political acumen. I wonder if the Lord had anything to do with it? I wonder if something higher than anything spoken of in the political platforms wrought on our side? To God be the glory. His is the sunshine and the rain and the fertilization of a whole continent. When he smiles we prosper, and when he frowns we die.

If the rising wave of prosperity has not struck you yet, be patient—it will. First the businesses that stand nearest to the radical needs of society feel the impulse; then the next, and the next, and the next, until every pin, every needle, every hammer, every spade, every trowel, every painter's pencil, every sculptor's chisel, every hand, every foot, every brain are lifted up in the flood. But do not rush into expenditures through mere anticipated good fortune. That is the trouble. We are all tempted to spend money before we make it. Peter was so anxious to get ashore he jumped into the water and would have gone to the bottom but for Christ's rescue. If he had waited a little longer he would have reached land without getting wet. Better wait until you get ashore, than jump into expenses for which you are not ready. You may be drowned.

I hope that our coming national prosperity will last at least as long as our national distresses have lasted. For ten years there was trouble, trouble, trouble. What if we had ten years of successes; could we stand them? God only knows how much prosperity is good for us. But it is strengthening to know that he mingles the cup of life in right proportion, and that he knows what is best, and that, however we may make mistakes, he is undeviatingly right and always right. Blessed is that man who is willing in all things fully to trust him.

Ring the Bells

(See Colored Illustration on First Page)

WAKE up all the echoes of cavern and hill with Christmas bells. The days of joy have come, days of reunion, days of congratulation. "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy that shall be to all people."

First, let the bells ring at the birth of Jesus! Mary watching, the camels moaning, the shepherds rousing up, the angels hovering, all Bethlehem stirring. What a night! Out of its black wing is plucked the pen from which to write the brightest songs of earth and the richest doxologies of heaven. Let camel or ox in stable that night in Bethlehem, after the burden-bearing of the day, stand and look at Him who is to carry the burdens of the world. Put back the straw and hear the first cry of Him who is come to assuage the lamentations of all ages.

Christmas bells ring out the peace of nations! We want on our standards less of the lion and eagle and more of the dove. Let all the canon be dismounted, and the war-horses change their gorgeous caparisons for plough-harness. Let us have fewer bullets and more bread. Life is too precious to dash it out against the brick casemates. The first "Peace Society" was born in the clouds, and its resolution was passed unanimously by angelic voices; "Peace on earth, good-will to men."

Christmas bells ring in family reunions! The rail trains crowded with children coming home. The poultry, fed as never since they were born, stand wondering at the farmer's generosity. The markets are full of massacred barnyards. The great table will be spread and crowded with two, or three or four generations. Plant the fork astride the breast-bone, and with skilful twist, that we could never learn, give to all the hungry lookers-on a specimen of holiday anatomy. The boy is fond of music, give him the drum-stick. The minister is dining with you, give him the parson's nose. May the joy reach from grandfather, who is so dreadfully old he can hardly find the way to his plate, down to the baby in the high-chair, with one smart pull of the table-cloth, upsetting the gravy into the cranberry. Send from your table a liberal portion to the table of the poor, some of the white meat as well as the dark, not confining your generosity to gizzards and scraps.

Let the whole land be full of chime and carol. Let bells, silver and brazen, take their sweetest voice, and all the towers of Christendom rain music. We wish all our friends a Merry Christmas!

The Grandest of all Bibles

CAPT. JOHN CONLINE, U.S.A., writes from Detroit, Mich.: "I am pleased beyond expression with the beautiful Red Letter Bible. It is an exquisite word picture of the most extraordinary Being that ever graced this world, with the beauty of His character, the grandeur of His principles, and the immeasurable superiority and purity of the life which He enjoyed and expounded, and of which He in His person, was, and will ever remain the most brilliant example. Of course, Jesus Christ, being the Son of God, could not be otherwise than the living embodiment of truth, justice, righteousness, honor, courage, gentleness, chivalry, and all the virtues that adorn a pure and upright life. Your Bible presents the work of our Lord and Saviour with all the clearness and brilliancy of a star of the first magnitude in a clear sky at midnight."

"Each Picture a Gem"

Florence B., Philadelphia, writes: "The Portfolio is more than we expected, and we are so pleased with it. Each picture a gem. We expected something fine after what you said in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; but this goes ahead of our expectations. Thank you so much. I am glad all the subscribers will be made happy; but don't see how you can do so much."

A Prince in Palestine

RECENT letters from the Holy Land report the arrival there of an illustrious visitor. A German warship cruising in the Eastern Mediterranean, after visiting Constantinople, proceeded to Jaffa, the ancient Joppa. On board, serving as an officer, was Prince Adalbert, the third son of the Emperor William. He, with forty-nine other officers of the ship, landed, and went thence to Jerusalem. The photographs reproduced on this page, show the young Prince and his suite visiting the Mosque of Omar, which stands on the site of Solomon's Temple, and a later visit to the tomb of Absalom. The prince remained four days in Jerusalem. He attended a service in the German church of the Redeemer, which was formally dedicated during his father's visit recently. The party were received, by the Sultan's orders, with the utmost respect, and were conducted over the traditional scenes associated with our Lord's life and with the events of Bible history. They showed marked intelligence, indicating an acquaintance with the Bible which is not always found in young men of royal and aristocratic birth. The prince's visit, like those of other princes and tween the shafts, dragged the cutter. It was hard work, but he struggled on, and finally, after covering four miles, he reached a farm-house where he was hospitably received. If he had been asked, under other circumstances, to do the work of a horse, he would have regarded it as a degradation; but when the lives of his wife and children were at stake, he put aside his natural pride. Love is a master-passion which does not shrink from self-sacrifice. We all admire it, though few realize how much the race owes to it in the person of Christ:

Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant (Phil. 2:6).

In the Wrong Boat

A recently arrived German immigrant had a disagreeable experience in New York last week. Her friends live at a village in New Jersey, and being aware that she would be likely to be confused by the noise and bustle of New York, they gave her careful instructions how to reach the ferryboat which would take her from that city to Hoboken. But she failed to understand the directions, and when she saw a crowd of people going on board a she must have wandered for two days. She was so near her daughter's home when she died that it is strange she did not recognize landmarks that must have been familiar to her. It is probable, however, that she reached the place where her body was found, after nightfall, when the landmarks could not be seen. She apparently was completely worn out and lay down on the bare ground exhausted, and was frozen to death in the night. If she had continued her weary tramp an hour longer, she would have reached her daughter's house. It was sad to come so near home and yet to miss it. Unhappily, many souls perish in the same way. They have many good qualities and a genuine admiration for the cause of Christ, but never enter the kingdom.

When Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, he said unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God (Mark 12:34).

The kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it (Rev. 21:24).

Worked as a Horse

During the recent storm in the western section of New York State, there was a deed of heroism performed which will not soon be forgotten by any of the persons concerned. A young Scotchman, who has been in this country since his boyhood, received some good news about two months ago. He has a wife and two children, and has found it hard work to make a living here. Sickness and misfortunes of various kinds have kept him poor, and, though he struggled with the energy and frugality characteristic of his race, he could not make much financial progress. When, therefore, in November last, he received word from relatives in Scotland that a good position in a manufactory in Aberdeen was open to him, he lost no time in disposing of his property here and setting out for New York. His wife wished to pay a farewell visit on the way to her friends at Haverstraw, so he put her and their children on a sleigh with the baggage, intending to leave the horse and sleigh at Haverstraw and make the remainder of the journey by rail. For the first few miles all went well, but then it began to snow heavily and there was a bitter, cutting wind. To make matters worse the horse fell lame, and finally fell down, breaking its leg. The man realized that they were in great danger, for there was no shelter at hand, and in such a storm his wife and children might freeze to death. His decision was soon taken. Removing the harness from the horse, he adjusted it to his own person, and going be-vessel she followed them, and went down at once into the saloon. She had not been on a ferryboat and did not know what it was like. She waited patiently for some time, and then asked an officer when the boat would reach Hoboken. To her consternation, he told her she was on the steamer Patricia, bound for Hamburg. Her distress was so keen that the sympathy of the captain was enlisted, and he arranged with the pilot to take her back with him. For two nights and a day she was on board the pilot boat before an opportunity occurred of sending her back to New York. The sea was very rough and she suffered agonies of sea-sickness. On the morning of the second day a tug passed, and she was put on board and brought to the city, where her friends found her and took her to their home. Unpleasant as her experience was, it would have been worse if she had not discovered her mistake so soon. Unhappily, people in the voyage of life, often neglect to ascertain their destination until it is almost impossible to rectify a mistake, and they are lost through their heedlessness.

There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death (Prov. 16:25).

Died Near Home

The body of an aged woman was found on Dec. 9, near Matawan, N. J. She usually resided with a married daughter, but recently she went to the house of a farmer, a few miles away, to help in some special work. The work was finished earlier than she expected, and she set out for her daughter's house. She was not missed, because the farmer knew that she had gone to her daughter's house, and the daughter supposed she was still with the farmer. But she appears to have lost her way, and, judging by her tracks, it is inferred that leaders are convinced that the Sultan will not resist the offers that can be made to him, if there is a fair response to their appeals to their people.

There are now in Southern India 220 Christian Endeavor Societies, with an aggregate of 6,029 members. A large convention was held recently at Coimbatore.

A revival is in progress at Newtonville, N. Y., under the leadership of Rev. H. M. Boyce, of the M. E. Church, assisted by evangelists E. T. Liddell and wife. Over fifty persons have confessed Christ, and the meetings are still as largely attended as ever.

Pastors needing a temporary supply for their pulpits or assistance in evangelistic work, will be glad to hear that very efficient and capable service in either capacity may be obtained by addressing Rev. W. T. Stokes, 782 Jefferson avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

We deeply regret to hear of the death of Mr. H. B. Gibbud, of Springfield, Mass. Mr. Gibbud's work among the hop-pickers, and in other spheres of labor in New York and other cities, is well known. Earnest, self-sacrificing, devoted, he proved himself a good and faithful servant of Jesus Christ, whose departure will be sincerely mourned by a wide circle of friends.

The Rev. F. S. Webster, of London, John Brash, of Liverpool, and W. D. Moffatt, of Edinburgh, representative speakers of the great Keswick movement of England, have just completed a six weeks' tour in Canada. They were sent out by the Keswick Missionary Council, in London, at the invitation of the three Keswick committees of Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal.

The Washington Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn, began the celebration of its fiftieth anniversary on December 8. The programme of the celebration included a historical sermon by the pastor, the Rev. Robert MacDonald, and addresses by neighboring pastors. The church was organized in 1851, with twenty-seven members, and its present building was erected in 1860. The membership is now nearly eight hundred.

The town of Sussex, N. J. has experienced a remarkable revival of religion. All the churches united in daily meetings. The pastors made a house-to-house visitation and invited the people to the services. About eighty new members will be added to the rolls of the churches, and the former members are all taking a deeper interest in spiritual matters. Dr. N. B. Randall, of East Orange, N. J., assisted the pastors in the work.

The topics for the Week of Prayer suggested by the Evangelical Alliance follow the customary order: Monday, January 6, For a deeper realization of the power and holiness of God; Tuesday, For our nation and a continuance of God's favor to it; Wednesday, For our Churches, Sunday Schools and Young People's Societies; Thursday, For Missions, Home and Foreign; Friday, For the Family and the School and for parents in the training of their children; Saturday, For the speedy coming of the Kingdom of God.

A CHRISTMAS BOX

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

LINDA WEST rose wearily the day before Christmas, to go to her work in the stocking factory. I wonder if girls who have only to help their mothers about the house, and girls who have only to ask their fathers for money when they want it, ever stop to think of the one million young women in this land who toil from day's beginning to day's ending, six days a week, at the labor of loom, machine, canning factory or shop. A great host of young women, who help along the commerce of the world. In the march of invention these girls have been pushed out of the home into business, and of it they are an integral part. In the stocking factory where Linda was employed, the air was thick with flying bits of cotton and fluff, so that the workers wore a protector over mouth and nose, that they might not breathe this floating stuff. The hours were long, the work deadly monotonous, and Linda's need of money for the home dear ones was so great, that she economized on her food as well as on her clothes. In consequence, she was a very tired body on the day before Christmas.

"Can you get anything for the children, Lindy?" The mother asked the question timidly, for she was afraid of Linda's temper. Because Linda was overworked and anxious she was often fretted and cross. So hard to get necessary things—meat, potatoes, coal, wood, bread, and her mother wanted candies and dolls for the children. Only a little more money, and these little indulgences could be managed; but Linda did not see how the little more was to be found. Yet she answered her mother cheerfully:

"Yes, I'll manage it somehow."

As she went down the street to her work, she met her cousin, Allie March.

"Will you go to buy your shoes before you come home to-night?" said Allie. "You know its pay-night."

"I can get along with my old shoes. I can wear rubbers this weather." Linda's tone was indifferent.

"O, Linda! Why is it you never buy yourself anything?" "Well, I can't, Allie. Too many to feed at home, and Pa's out of work again. Ma's sick, too."

Allie said no more. She knew it would not be worth while. Linda and she were great friends. They would work side by side the whole morning, but the rules forbade them to speak during work hours. If they did, they would be fined. As they entered the great iron gates, the manager's children, in red caps and mittens, with warm, fleecy cloaks of gray wool, and skates in their hands, went tripping by.

"Merry Christmas," they called, but the two girls made no reply. A young woman about their own age, who was the children's governess, observed the silence and the sober faces. Presently she was joined by a friend, a brilliantly beautiful girl, with large, soft brown eyes and dancing dimples, a girl wrapped in furs, and as royal as a princess in her bearing.

"Amy," said the new-comer, "Miss Cushman's to address the girls in the factory at the noon hour. Would you not like to come with her and me?"

"Yes, dear Eleanor," answered the governess, "if you and Miss Cushman mean to put any cheer in those sadly dreary lives. Those girls don't want to be preached

"Miss Cushman won't preach."

"No, I think she has too much tact and sympathy to do anything so stupid and unkind. I wish we make a Christmas for those girls—send every one a Christmas box."

"What! to five hundred girls, Amy!"

"I see it's a big contract; but could we not have a party, or something on Christmas, and give one a bit of a treat?"

"My dear child, to-morrow will be Christmas! There's no time."

"With all your money, my cleverness, and Miss Cushman's experience, and the phone, and a whole day! There's plenty of time. Run on child, the pond's firm; we've got a scheme on hand, or on foot, as you must not interrupt."

Eleanor and Amy thought it was a goodly plan.

When the noon hour came, Miss Cushman, the bright, capable settlement worker, who knew and loved working, stood upon a table and made an announcement.

"Friends," she said, "You are all asked to a Christmas party this evening at Miss Slocum's. You must come promptly at eight; there'll be music, games, and it's not a dress-up party, for there'll be a candy table and lots of fun."

When Linda and Allie went home, both expressed their curiosity about the invitation, but both were resolved to go. It was a surprise and a novelty, both were alluring to girls who had little pleasure. As Allie and Linda and turned the corner to go to her own home, a dark-faced young man, rather of the order of "tough," stepped up and familiarly accosted her. "Going to supper over at Drolin's with to-night, Allie?" he asked her.

"No, Fred, not to-night. The girls are invited, the whole crowd to a Christmas-Eve party, a swarree, at Miss Slocum's and we're goin'." "Sudden, ain't it?"

"Rather, but swell, tip-top. And I'll tell you about to-morrow, Fred, so good-night. I say, Fred, please stay out late anywhere; it grieves your mother so."

"Don't you bother about me, Al; you needn't give orders if you are my cousin," he said, shuffling away with a mixture of affection and defiance.

"Poor old Fred! He's vexed. Maybe I'd ought to have gone with him; but I'm afraid of suppers at Drolin's."

"AND CROWD THE WHARF TO GREET THEIR OWN, WHEN THE BOATS COME HOME"

WHEN THE BOATS COME HOME

O there's sorrow in the village when the boats, they sail away,
The nights are very lonesome, and most laggard is the day;
But the old folk and the young folk send their cheers across the foam,
And crowd the wharf to greet their own, what day the boats come home.

CHRISTMAS IN A PALACE

WHEN King Edward VII. was Prince of Wales, Sandringham House was his favorite place of residence. There it was that the real home life of himself, the Princess, their children and grandchildren was passed, and there it was that their most intimate friends were received. Accession to the throne has it is said, changed the fondness of the royal pair for the place around which so many sacred associations cluster. Day, doubtless, Christmas pleasures and pastimes are as usual at Sandringham, although, of course, the many there may be larger, for a king's household grows. Really, too, there may be somewhat more of pomp and circumstance than hitherto.

According to the routine of previous holidays, loads of evergreens are delivered at the house early Christmas week by the head gardener, who is a person of special importance at holidays. The day before Christmas Eve, a great many presents are sent out—the last presents to absent friends and relatives being then dispatched. During the week, many guests are received. On Christmas Eve, the members of the Christmas party are received. On Christmas day a great many presents are made by the King and Queen. There is a distribution of gifts to the laborers, workmen and gers on the estate; and the family receives a fine joint beef. In the evening, the Christmas trees are all aglow in the palace, and the children have a lightful time. Christmas morning, the King's grandchildren wake to discover the many beautiful gifts. Santa Claus has left them. Later, Christmas services are held in St. Mary Magdalene's Church, and the entire household attends. For lunch, a visit is made to the animals on the estate, the King and Queen taking an interest in seeing to it that even the horses in the stables have a comfortable time. After tea, the American bowling alley furnishes amusement to those who like the game. The Christmas dinner in the dining-room crowns the day of family rejoicing.

The dining-room, with its tapestried walls and richly panelled ceiling, is the handsomest apartment at Sandringham. Members of the family seat themselves down both sides of the table, the King and Queen occupying central positions, facing each other. Queen Alexandra is very fond of skating, and, if the weather permits, the royal family spend Christmas afternoon skimming over the ice.

Their majesties are very particular that every one shall attend the church services. This they have always been, and regular attendance on divine service is expected of the royal household on Sundays, as well as at Christmas time. The church is in a very quiet and pretty spot. There are no imposing statues or monuments; though here and there are tombstones, placed by order of the dren to come unto me;" the third child of King Edward and Queen Alexandra lies underneath.

Above the hall door, at Sandringham House, is a tablet with this inscription: "This house was built by Albert Edward, Prince of Wales and Alexandra, his wife, in the year of our Lord, 1870." The place is the King's private property, and is a three-hours' railway journey from London. In the construction and appointments of the palace, comfort rather than magnificence have been considered. Sandringham House has ever been noted for the charm of its hospitality. Here, in their own private dwelling, the royal master and mistress have shown a wonderfully happy taste in putting people at their ease, and making guests thoroughly at home. Here it is that favored and intimate friends have seen Queen Alexandra at her spinning-wheel, engaged in the very womanly occupation of spinning flax, after the quaint fashion of queens of old. And here, in the royal nursery, the future King of Great Britain, Emperor of India, etc., etc., may be seen gallantly riding his hobby-horse, a sport of which his Royal Highness, little Prince Edward of York, King Edward's grandson, is quite as fond as other little boys.

The presents which come to Sandringham at Christmas times and those which are sent out are legion. Very interesting stories could be written about them, too. The little German cousins in the Kaiser's palace at Potsdam or Berlin must be remembered; of course, too, very charming gifts are received from them. If any children in the world have a good time Christmas, it is those of Germany, where Santa Claus is, if possible, held in more distinguished regard than anywhere else on earth. Then, little kinsfolk in Russia, Denmark, Greece, and other countries have part, by

A woman wouldn't like my going if she knew it. I want to see what the inside of a mill-owner's home looks like. I went to walk on soft carpets, and sit in velvet chairs." The evening came. The great drawing-room at the Slocum's had never been so thronged, and as the three hostesses welcomed their guests, tears struggled for place with Eleanor's smile, and Amy's voice almost broke. Only Miss Cushmet met the factory workers exactly as she would have met any other set of friends, simply, sweetly, hospitably, and on their own plane. To her the world contained only two kinds of people, those who were saved, being Christ's followers, those who were unsaved, being his foes.

It was a most successful evening. As the guests left, in every hand was slipped a little Christmas box, tied with red ribbon. In each box was a dainty handkerchief, a satin bow, and a crisp new two-dollar bill, and on a card was written, "Wishing you a Merry Christmas, with love."

To have done this in a hurry was no slight task, and other girls had come to the aid of the first three. They were well repaid by the beaming looks of the girls they had entertained. The stocking-hands had been recognized as human beings and comrades. They awakened on Christmas morning to a new appreciation of what the angels meant when they sang "Peace on earth, good-will to men."

THE SPIRITUAL LAND OF PROMISE

THE PROMISE OF POWER

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JAN. 5.
ACTS 1: 11

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT: "YE SHALL RECEIVE POWER AFTER THAT THE HOLY SPIRIT IS COME UPON YOU. ACTS 1: 8

FROM our study of the beginnings of the Jewish Church, we turn to the study of the beginnings of the Christian Church. We left the Israelites on the safe side of the Red Sea, but with forty years of wilderness training between them and the Land of Promise. To-day we look in on the disciples of Christ when only ten days were to intervene before they would enter into a new world of spiritual power and world conquest. To the wilderness journeys of Israel corresponded the earthly life of Christ, with its miracles, its wanderings from place to place, preparing the disciples for a higher spiritual life, which, after three years of divine teaching, only one hundred and twenty were ready to receive. When Christ was about to ascend, they were so filled with patriotic dreams of conquering, rather than converting other nations, that they said to him, "Wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" In response, Christ gave the great promise, which they could but slightly understand until fulfilled: "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Spirit is come upon you." Israel under Joshua appropriated only one-third of the Land of Promise, unwilling to make further efforts at conquest, though sure of success. So many Christians stop short in their spiritual self-conquest, and the Church falters in its world conquest with less than one-third of Christ's ascension promises appropriated, though complete conquest in both realms is assured to all who will fulfil the conditions. At this opening of another year Christ anew calls us to receive and use to the utmost the promised power that shall conquer "the world" in us and the world outside.

The Lesson Story

What mountain on earth is nearer to heaven than any other? To answer this question it will not be necessary to find

If we had been there that day on Mount Olivet, we would have seen Jesus, after he had spoken his last words, raise his hands—those hands that helped so many—to bless all who were gathered there, and while he was in the act of blessing, we would have seen him rise above the earth into the air, high up among the clouds, and then he would have passed from our sight. And when we were looking, hoping that the clouds might part and give us another sight of him, we would have heard a strange voice and seen two persons, whose appearance was different from the others, for they were angels, and whose voices had sweet and silvery tones, and we would have heard them say: "He will come again as you saw him go." If we had been there that day, we might have said: "Let us stay here a while, the spot is too dear to leave." But we would have seen the Apostles and other friends turning away, and starting for Jerusalem, intent on going to the very room where they had eaten the last supper with Jesus, for Jesus had told them to wait there until he should send the Holy Spirit. Would we not have gone with them? But we can even now go to the place of prayer and receive fulfillment of that same promise of power to be witnesses and workers for him.

Illustration and Application

"Does your rich son never send you any money?" said a neighbor to a woman living in poverty, knowing that her son, living in a far-off land, was reputed to be prosperous. "He sends very kind letters," said the contented, though poor, mother, "but nothing else but pretty pictures that I will show you laid between the leaves of my Bible." The "pretty pictures" were crisp bank notes, that she was speedily informed were promises to pay that she could turn into money enough to low-citizens in Jerusalem, and then their countrymen in Judea, but also the "heathen at home" in Samaria, and it was harder yet to raise them to make them feel the call to carry the good news to strange and far-off peoples. Even now Christian churches put three-fourths of their prayers and gifts into their own towns, even when they are more than abundantly supplied with Gospel privileges. It is like working a train up a mountain by long zigzagging to get most Christians to really pray and work and give till they feel it to Christianize other parts of their own country. Some church people near the nation's capital, asked to help secure a Sunday law for it from Congress, replied, "What business is it of ours. We will take care of our own town. Let Washington take care of itself." Except in times of war, the sense of nationality is weak, that of locality strong. And even in this twentieth Christian century, a majority of Christians show very little sense of obligation to their brothers of other tints in other zones, save when their bodies are in peril of pestilence or famine. Yet no one can read the life of Christ, who left heaven to be a missionary to the whole earth, and doubt that the fullest Christlikeness is found when we feel for the souls of those in the uttermost parts without neglecting the work at our own doors.

The great word of Christ up to the Ascension had been "Come." He had called men to meeting, to meet him and each other to be spiritually fed and trained. But he would not have any one think that meetings are anything but preparations for "divine service" to which he bids us all "go," when meetings, which are our spiritual meals, have "fed" and so strengthened and prepared us for work and warfare. President Roosevelt, in a recent article in the British Fortnightly Magazine, has made a powerful plea for a philanthropy that is not so much institutional and is more personal than the com-which are the highest mountains. The mountain we are seeking is the spot of earth on which the feet of Jesus last rested before he ascended to be again with his Father and the holy angels. Slowly his feet were lifted from Mt. Olivet, and he went up, up into the clouds, and was hidden from sight.

THE ASCENSION

And where is Mount Olivet? Let us go to Jerusalem to find it. Let us stand on Mount Moriah, in the Gate Beautiful of the Temple. We see Mount Olivet directly opposite, but across the deep valley of Jehoshaphat, through which flowed the brook Kedron. The Mount of Ascension is not a high mountain, only about 500 feet above the valley. It is covered with olive trees, and is therefore called Mount Olivet, or the Mount of Olives. We are not satisfied to look at this sacred mountain, but must cross the valley and stand upon Olivet itself. As we press forward, and climb it, let us try to remember the many times Jesus passed over the same ground. We would like to find the very spot from which the feet of Jesus rose on that ascension day. Some monks at the Church of the Ascension will offer to show us just where Jesus stood. But they know nothing about it. But we know that we see the same landscape that Jesus saw that day. If we were going to build a chapel to mark the place of his ascension, it would be close to Bethany.

But let us not think so much of the place as of the words Jesus spoke that day as his good-bye. If we had been there, we surely would have seen, with the disciples, his mother, Mary, and probably Joseph, of Arimathea, if he was yet alive, and Mary Magdalene, and the other women who had come to the tomb early on that resurrection day, more than a month before. We would have seen Mary and Martha and Lazarus, and many whom Jesus had healed. We would have seen many whose names we did not know, for there were about one hundred and twenty persons in all. A feeling of awe was in every heart, for all knew that Jesus was about to do some great thing! We would have heard the blessed voice of Jesus saying: "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Spirit is come upon you, and ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." They could not yet understand about the Holy Spirit, although Jesus had said much about this Comforter he would send after he had gone from them (John, chaps. 14 to 17).

more than supply all her needs. Some one has counted thirty-one thousand promises in the Bible, enough to make us all rich in graces of character if we would but appropriate them. But most of them are but "pictures" in our Bible. A woman lost her spectacles for years, and only found them when a stranger in her home opened her neglected Bible. In it indeed are lost treasures that shall be ours when we will open it on our knees and ask God to fulfil his promises to us, we ourselves first fulfilling the conditions.

Human promises we learn to distrust. Every week tradespeople promise us goods at a certain time, and break these promises as often as they keep them, seldom thinking such lying even calls for an apology. There is great need for preaching and teaching on the sacredness of promises, especially of promises made to children.

Confidently may we rely on the two great promises in this lesson, the promise of power for witnessing and work in all lands, and of the final triumph of Christ in his glorious appearing as the world's King. We are weak, but he will supply power. Sin abounds, but "Jesus shall reign." These are the inspiring assurances with which we go forth to repeat the missionary life of Christ, that lies between that Christmas assurance that he should be "a light to lighten the Gentiles," and our New Year's lesson from his ascension command that we shall be his witnesses to the uttermost parts of the earth.

What a geography lesson is this before us, with all the world and heaven besides in its scope! City missions, "Jerusalem," home missions, in "Judea and Samaria," and foreign missions in "the uttermost parts of the earth," are all presented as one progressive work of evangelization. The antipodal point to Jerusalem is in Hawaii, "the uttermost part of the earth" to Christ, now under our own flag, but reached by missionaries March 31, 1819. It has been a long task, the effort of Christ to develop such a sense of human brotherhood under the divine Fatherhood that the apostles would be zealous not only to Christianize their fellow type. The churches need a like exhortation not to rely too much on formal "meetings" of crowds. The meeting now most needed is the "meeting" of man and man, the man with Christ in his soul with the man who needs that same life. Often half a dozen persons will put in days of time to "get up a meeting," to which almost no one will come who is not already in sympathy with its purpose, when in the same time they could have spoken personally to a hundred who needed the message. "Men will go for whiskey, but milk must be brought to the door." Let the meetings be but points of departure, arsenals where we get our rations and loaded rifles and orders, from which we shall "go" in obedience to the Ascension command, and in the strength of the Ascension promise, to carry a glad testimony of Christ and righteousness in all its forms in spoken word and printed page from door to door. Better fewer and shorter meetings, if necessary, to make time for this witnessing in our own Jerusalem. Not for an occasional church census only, with its formal blanks, but for monthly calls from door to door, the churches of every town might well organize their seventies to go forth as of old, two and two, in Christ's name. Protestants often charge that to Roman Catholics religion is only going to mass. But to many of us is not religion chiefly going to meetings? In some churches it is felt that only those are to speak even in meetings who can "edify." But Christ's word was "testify." No man is excused in court who is needed as a witness and has some important truth to tell, because he cannot tell it eloquently. Not to apostles only, but to the whole one hundred and twenty, some of them women, Jesus said, "Ye shall be witnesses unto me." In meeting and out, by silence or speech, by deed as well as word, we witness for or against him. A South Sea Islander's closing prayer of a meeting was as follows: "O God, we are about to go to our respective homes. Let not the words we have heard be like the fine clothes we wear, soon to be taken off and folded up in a box till another Sabbath comes around. Rather let thy truth be like the tattoo on our bodies, ineffaceable till death."

The Needle's Eye

BY FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ANew SERIAL STORY WRITTEN EXPRESSLY

Chapter V—Revelation

LIZABETH found the child sitting motionless in the hay-mow where his mother had died. Long, cloudy shafts of yellow light descended upon his bowed shoulders from the one window high up in the dim wall. To the tearful eyes of the woman this dazzling glory appeared like mighty wings stretching up and away from the lonely little figure. "On, 'Manuel,'" she whispered, "look up, an' speak to munny!"

The child threw his arms about her neck with a little sob. Elizabeth covered the small tear-stained face with passionate kisses. "He's gone, deary," she whispered; "an' he won't be back fer a spell. Come in with munny an' eat some dinner; I saved a nice little pie a purpose fer you."

The boy shook his head and struggled to his feet. "I want to go," he said; "I want to go out doors."

Elizabeth involuntarily drew back before the dumb pain in the childish eyes. Then she stretched out her arms longingly, "I want to tell you somethin', 'Manuel,'" she pleaded. "Jes' wait a minit, deary! I didn't mean to tell you till you was growed up; but I reckon I will—though I don't sca'cely know what good it'll do."

She paused, picking absently at the folds of her checkered apron, "Ef 'Rastus was yer father," she burst out at length, "it 'ud be diff'runt! You ain't like us; I allus knew it, an' the breed's more'n the pastur' every time. Yes—if you was like him it 'ud all be diff'runt."

"Who is my father?"

The question brought Elizabeth's wandering thoughts to a standstill. "Your father?" she repeated. "Why, I—" Her face whitened a little under the impact of a sudden, startling thought which had reached her from out of the unseen. "'Manuel,'" she said, solemnly, "I'm a-goin' to fetch somethin' out of the spare room; you stay here till I come back."

When she returned she carried the russet-bound Bible, wrapped carefully in a white cloth. "This 'ere Bible 's yourn, 'Manuel,'" she said, reverently unwrapping it. "I was 'lottin' to give it to you when you was growed; but I'm goin' to give it to you now. This book was yer ma's; it tells all about yer Father which is in heaven."

The child took the book in his hands, lifting grave, questioning eyes to the woman's flushed face. "You are mother," he said, simply.

"Yes," she said, breathlessly, "as fur's lovin' you's concerned, I be. But your own mother was a beautiful lady; she died when you was a teeny baby. I've been a-takin' care of you fer her. She's with you most all the while, times 'at I can't be."

"Yes," said Immanuel, nodding emphatically. Elizabeth leaned forward to peer into the downcast face. "But you ain't never seen her, deary."

The child shook his head. "Sometimes I dream of a beautiful lady," he said. "She loves me very much."

"Yes, that's her," sighed Elizabeth, patting the little brown hand which was folded in both of hers. "She was han'some as a pictur'! But yer Father, 'Manuel, loves you a sight more 'n either of us women-folks. I couldn't begin to tell you how much store he doos set by you. I'm a-goin' to read somethin' out this 'ere book right now, then I'll have to go in an' wash the dishes. Bimeby you kin read it yerself; you know yer letters a'ready, an' I mean you shall have learnin'."

"I know all the words on the mowing-m'chine, an' most all the words on this page," said the child, eagerly producing a fragment of newspaper from his pocket. "I found it in the road," he explained; "an' the sounds of the letters make words. I found it out."

"Fer the land's sake, child, you'd really ought to hev schoolin'," was Elizabeth's comment. "Now you listen, 'cause my dish-water's gettin' stun cold."

She read from the sixth chapter of Matthew's gospel, and on through a part of the seventh, pausing now and again to wrestle with a difficult pronunciation, then gliding on triumphantly through an easier passage. "There!" she exclaimed, shutting the book with a long breath; "them 's the words of Jesus; you've heard of him frequent a'ready. He knew more 'n any other man 'bout yer Father. Somewheres I remember 'at he said you was to call no man on airth father, 'cause there is one 'at is your Father in heaven."

"Where is heaven?" asked the child, wonderingly.

"It's up—" began Elizabeth, then she stopped short, a strange look of triumph dawning in her dim eyes. "It certainly says in this 'ere Bible, that yer Father is in heaven, same's I read, 'Our Father which art in heaven.' An' ag'in it says 'at he 's everywhere. He made everythin' you kin see—everythin' pretty 'at you set store by, flowers an' butterflies an' the brook, yes, an' strawb'ries an' apples an' sich—everythin'. Now it jest come into my mind, though I ain't never thought so before, that if yer heavenly Father 's everywhere, then heaven mus' be—everywheres 'at he is."

"IT TELLS ALL ABOUT YOUR FATHER WHICH IS IN HEAVEN"

"Am I in heaven now?" asked the child, in an awed whisper. "Is my Father here?"

"Oh, Lord, don't ye let me tell him anythin' 'at ain't so!" petitioned Elizabeth, silently. Then with sudden illumination, she cried: "Yes, 'Manuel, you be in heaven now; 'cause it says 'at in Him we live an' move an' have our bein', an' there can't be anything better than that anywheres! I don't seem to sense it allers when things go cross-ways in the kitchen, but mebbe you kin ef you begin when you're little, an' think 'bout it frequent."

With that she slipped away in sudden trepidation, fancying that she heard the sound of voices from without. "If I've said anythin' 'at ain't so, Lord," she ejaculated, as she hurried along the narrow path, "jest see 'at he forgits it! I fergit easier 'n I remember, an' there 's times 'at I'm awful glad of it!—Good land! I wonder who that is, an' my dishes a-settin' round."

Two female figures were standing under the shelter of the stoop at the side door; while beneath the shade of the big soft maple a superannuated sorrel horse nibbled languidly at the fence post. "Well—well! Mis' Winch, here you be at last!" cried the visitors in chorus. "We 's been a-knockin' fer quite a spell," continued one of them, a stout, purple-faced lady, attired in a much-creased linen gown. "Lidy, she would have it you was out burryin', but I says, she can't be fur, I says, 'cause the kitchen doors an' winders is wide open."

"I jest run out to the barn a minit," said Elizabeth, awkwardly, her face on fire as she regarded her disordered kitchen from the coign of vantage occupied by the new comers. "Do walk right in the settin' room where it's cool. I guess you foun' it pretty warm a-ridin' in the sun, didn't you, Mis' Harney?" she added interrogatively, when her two visitors were seated.

"Yes, 'twas turrible warm," said the person addressed, plying her palm-leaf fan with long, easy strokes. "I s'pose I sense the heat more 'n most folks on 'count of my heft. We 've been to the buryin' ground, me an' Lidy; it looks real neat at this time of the year; don't it, Lidy?"

"It cert'ly doos," assented the other, with a long-drawn plaintive sigh; "an' it's really edifyin' to read off the tombstones; it keeps us in mind of our approachin' end. I says to Mis' Harney, it won't be long, I says, before you'll be a-layin' me away in this 'ere spot. I've got my grave all picked out. How 've you been feelin' this summer, Mis' Winch? Seem 's so you wa'n't lookin' as well 's usual. An' how 's that poor unfortinit child you took to raise?"

Elizabeth's thin face flushed hotly. "I guess I'm 's well 's usual," she said, stiffly.

"An' the little boy?" persisted the lady, peering sharply out of the shuttered windows. "I don't see him 'round anywheres. But mebbe school ain't out yit."

"'Manuel don't go to school," said Elizabeth, compressing her lips tightly, as she plaited her apron strings into a frill. "He—he 's a-learnin' to home," she added, with a defiant lift of the head. "He ain't but six; there's plenty of time fur his schoolin'."

"My Benny had his primer read through twice afore he was six," observed Mrs. Harney, complacently. "But, of course, Benny was extr'y smart; he takes after my folks, Benny doos. Course it ain't to be expected 'at a pauper 'ud—"

"I never see a brighter child 'an my 'Manuel,'" said Elizabeth, sharply. "He—he kin read in the newspapers, 'Manuel kin; an' I guess there ain't many childern any smarter 'an that!"

"I want to know!" ejaculated both ladies, in long-drawn incredulity. They leaned forward and stared searchingly at their hostess' flushed face.

After a pregnant pause, Mrs. Harney settled back heavily in her chair. "We've been thinkin' fer quite a spell of takin' a boy to raise," she said, wiping the moist creases of her features with a limp pocket-handkerchief. "Our Benny don't take to the shop; I tell his pa he ain't built fer a blacksmith, and there ain't no use in takin' 'bout it. I'd ruther he'd clerk it after a spell. Of course, Ben, he 's allers wanted the boy in the shop; but Benny's too much like my folks. So I says to Ben the other day when he was goin' on 'bout it; 'Ben, I says, 'why don't you take a likely boy an' fetch him up to take a holt in the shop? He c'd begin, I says, 'a-fetchin' an' carryin', a-blowin' the belluses an' haldin' the horses.' Ben says to me, 'Whar's yer boy,' he says. 'I don't want no fool boy,' he says; 'but a smart, likely boy 'at could earn his salt I'd take in a minit.' Then thinks I, mebbe Mis' Winch 'ull be glad to git rid of that boy she's got. As I says to Ben, she's done her full share towards fetchin' him up. I says."

Elizabeth, sitting rigidly erect in her chair, stared at the speaker without replying.

"Why don't you tell her right out what's goin' the rounds of the village, Jane?" demanded the other lady, smoothing her bonnet strings with an air of importance. "I believe in comin' right out with the trewth every time—there's nothing so hullsome as trewth. I'm always fur tellin' things jest as they be without fear ner favor, more especial when I feel 's o' it was my Christian dooty, as I cert'nly do to-day."

Elizabeth's eyes had shifted from the purple expanse of Mrs. Harney's countenance; her gaze seemed concentrated upon the spinster's ill-fitting artificial teeth, which clicked an animated accompaniment to her words. "Yes," clicked that lady with growing earnestness, "when a child gets abused so it's the talk of the town, I think it's time to interfere!"

"Ben, he hears it mentioned at the shop ev'ry once in a while," broke in Mrs. Harney. "Most everybody knows 'at your husband is a terrible ha'sh man, I says to Ben, I guess Mis' Winch won't be the one to stan' in the way of the boy, ef it's once named to her, I says. We'd give him 'nough to eat, an' ten weeks of schoolin' a year, an' a trade."

Elizabeth had risen to her feet; red spots glowed on either sallow cheek. "You want I should gin you my child?" she cried. "My child 'at I've took keer of all these years! Ain't you 'shamed to set in my house an' go on with sech talk? You 'd give him 'nough to eat, would ye, Mis' Harney? Well, I'm terrible 'bleeged to you, but I guess I kin make out with my cookin' long side o' yourn any day in the week. I ain't forgot the cake you brought to the donation! My 'Manuel is learnin' to work on the farm, an' of course he hes to be c'rrected same as other children. but—"

Her voice died away into silence, as her eyes wandered toward the open door.

Her guests looked at one another with meaning smiles. "I guess we'll hev to be gettin' along," remarked Mrs. Harney, rising with alacrity. "Your man 'll be comin' in fer his supper pretty soon, I shouldn't wonder. When folks don't git their dinner dishes outen the way 'fore three o'clock in the afternoon, they 'r likely to git flustered 'long 'bout tea time."

With this parting shot the two ladies turned their backs on their hostess and made their way down the narrow path to the front gate. The spinster's high-pitched giggle, in evident comment upon some sotto voce remark of the blacksmith's wife reached Elizabeth's ears and brought the angry tears to her eyes.

"An' I tol' 'Manuel 'at I reckoned we was in heaven a'ready!" she muttered, as she flew about her kitchen with savage energy; "Lord, what a liar I be!"

When the child came into the house, holding the book lovingly in both hands, his eyes shining like evening stars after rain, Elizabeth regarded him with a fretful wrinkling of her worn forehead. "Put yer Bible into the spare room under the bolster of the bed," she said, crisply. "You won't hev much time to be studin' it 'cept Sundays. Then I want you should go after the cows 's quick 's ever you kin. You kin eat this piece of bread an' butter to stay yer stomick till supper's ready."

"The simple idee!" she muttered to herself, as she stood on the back steps watching the little figure armed with the big piece of bread, "Mis' Harney mus' think 'at she 's smart."

Erastus Winch returned from his expedition with Mr. Dundor in unwonted good humor. "I ain't got much appetite," he remarked, as he reached across the table for his fourth biscuit, "for I e't pretty hearty to Turnerses. Liph, he 's a cute one; whilst we was eatin' pie an' doughnuts inside, his mare was feedin' out to the barn. I heerd him givin' Al Turner speshul d'rections. 'Be sure you rub her down keerful, Al,' he says; 'caskets is heavy haulin'. An' you kin slip an' extry feed of oats into the bag if you don't mind,' he says, kind of mournful like. 'They ain't nobody so free with things temp'ral as the b'reaved,' he says to me, as we was walkin' into the house; 'seems 's 'o they didn't sense it same 's at other times,' he says. 'It doos 'em good to spen' an' be spent; it ca'ms their sorer an' relieves their feelin's.' Say, 'Lizabeth, if I go first, don't you fergit to keep yer eyes peeled fer Liph. I swan, it 'ud make me right mad to look down f'om above an' see sech goin's on to my place!"

Elizabeth fetched a long sigh of pleasurable excitement. "Be you goin' to 'tend the fun'ral, Rastus?" she asked, timidly. "I dunno but I be," admitted Winch, fingering with satisfaction the large round of a silver dollar in his trowsers' pocket. "Liph, he mentioned my name as one of the bearers. They 're goin' to put on style an' sen' kerridges. I s'pose you kin go in the buggy ef you 're a min' to," he added, grudgingly.

Elizabeth's face lighted up. "My! I'd like to go real well, Rastus; I've stayed to hum pretty stiddy lately, an' fun'erals is always so interestin'. To-night 's the reg'lar prayer-meetin'." she went on, with a timid cough; "we ain't neither of us 'tended a meetin' fer quite a spell."

"I s'pose I kin hitch," growled Winch; "you ain't wanted to go 'n' count of him, an' you know you ain't."

"Land! 'Manuel 's big 'nough to go to meetin'; it'll do him good," said Elizabeth, cheerfully. "We don't want folks talkin' 'bout us anyhow." She ventured the last remark with an apprehensive glance at her husband's grim face.

"Who 's been here?" he demanded, pausing with his hand upon the latch. "Some clackin' hen, I'll bet a dollar!"

"Oh, 't wa'n't nothin' of any 'count, 'Rastus; on'y Mis' Harney stopped fer a minit, an' she said—"

"Let her min' her bizness, an' do you min' yourn!" responded Winch, with a sudden lapse into his usual marital manner. "An', say!—I ain't goin' to no prayer-meetin' to-night; I've fooled away 'nough time!"

"I might 'a knowed better," murmured Elizabeth with a resigned sigh. She was standing with folded arms at the open door of the kitchen. In the west, behind dark masses of orchard foliage the sky glowed a clear, pulsing amber, yearning toward the violet hues of mid-heaven through illimitable depths of vivid green. At the verge of the violet hung the new moon, a slender thread of light; above it swung the clear burning lamp of the evening star.

"There now! ef I ain't gone an' seen the new moon over my lef' shoulder ag'in!" she muttered. "All the signs is fer bad luck!" Her eye fell upon a small figure perched on the topmost rail of the fence. "'Manuel!" she called with sudden sharpness, "come right in outen that dew this minit! Nex' thing I know he'll be down sick with milary—what with the hot sun beatin' down on him daytimes an' all."

The child clambered down from his perch with manifest reluctance. "I was lookin' at it, munny," he said, pointing his small finger at the solemn pageant of heavenly color. "I'd like to go there!"

"Don't you be a talkin' nonsense, 'Manuel," exclaimed Elizabeth, severely. "You 're a-goin' to bed this minit, that 's where you 're a-goin'!"

"Does my Father live way up on the hill?" asked the child, his eyes turning wistfully to the window, as Elizabeth energetically scrubbed his face with a coarse brown towel.

"I guess so," said the woman, absently, "now I want you should say yer 'Now I lay me,' an' go right to sleep. 'Tain't healthy fer children to be too smart."

GAS AND TROUBLE.

Comes From White Bread.

While it is true that we build up the body from food, it is also true that different kinds of food have different effects on the body and produce different results.

For instance, it is absolutely impossible to live on white bread alone, for it contains almost nothing but starch, and an excess of white bread produces gas and trouble in the intestines, while, at the same time, the other elements required by the body for building up brain and nerve centers, as well as muscular tissue, have been left out of the white bread, and we see from experience the one trying to live on white bread alone gradually fails in mental and nervous power as well as loss in muscle.

Such a diet could not be kept up long without fatal results. A lady in Jacksonville, Fla., was crippled by an accident two years ago. Being without the power of exercise, an old stomach trouble that was hers for years became worse, and it was a serious question regarding food that she could digest.

A physician put her on Grape-Nuts Breakfast Food with some remarkable results. She says now that, not only is she able to do a big day's work, because of the strength of her brain and nerves, but that she has finally thrown away her crutches because the muscles of her limbs have gradually grown stronger since she began the use of Grape Nuts, and now she is practically well, and can go about without trouble, notwithstanding the fact that it was said she would never be able to walk again. So much for eating the right kind of food instead of remaining an invalid and a cripple because of the lack of knowledge of the kind of food to use to bring one back to health. The Miners' Sabbath Rest

IN a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Dr. Alexander De Soto, of the Wayside Mission and Hospital, Seattle, gives this interesting description of the Lord's Day as it is spent in a mining camp in the Sultan River region of Washington:

"At midnight Saturday all the valves of the mining machinery are tightened and closed, the floodgates that operate the flumes are shut down and everything is still in the camp. The Lord's Day morning breaks, bringing peace and restful quiet on its wings to all in the camp. The waiting for the 'crystal portal' to swing open. His big son, who comes of old church-going stock, and who never lost a day away from Sunday School as a lad, except the day his mother was buried, tenderly props the old man up.

"A couple of cedar logs are thrown on the fire, and as they blaze up, the leader of the little meeting—a member of the old Klondike Gospel band and former worker in the old Bowery Mission—announces the hymn. From strong throats and sound lungs bursts forth, 'Rock of ages, cleft for me, let me hide myself in thee.' A men read the Word and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The photograph I send you herewith explains itself. Our young engineer, Eugene Dan Read, one of the first converts of the Wayside Mission, is reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which all regard as the best and only camp paper in the world. 'Crystals cannot equal it,' is the theme of Dr. Talmage's sermon. They are miners and they know what a crystal is. They have risked their lives in steep places and on shaky mountain rocks to explore for the precious metal. To them, therefore, the sermon has a peculiar significance.

"The holy day is about to close, supper is over, the table cleared, and the camp bell rings for service. The bunkhouse and the various tents are emptied of their inhabitants, and they soon fill the big cabin. There is a long table in the center, with Bibles and hymn-books; the men sit down, each taking a hymn-book. Over in the corner on a bed rests an old Scotch miner; his son, a sturdy young fellow, sits at the bedside. The old miner has done his last prospecting, and he is patiently characteristic prayer follows, which thanks the Lord for everything, praises his mercy and goodness to the workers, asks that all pride and self-sufficiency be taken away and that the hearts of the suppliants may be filled with a sense of complete dependence on God. A blessing is implored for the camp, and all in it, both men and animals, and especially the old miner, whose sands are fast running out, that he may be ready 'to go down the divide, strong in faith, to cross the river below.' Nor are the loved ones, far away in their homes across the continent and the sea, forgotten in the earnest petition that ascends from the quiet camp amid the Sabbath silence. Another hymn is sung, the Scriptures are read, and a short, homelike sermon preached. More hymns are followed by a brief prayer. 'Jesus, lover of my soul' closes the hour and a-half of worship. With a hearty 'good-night,' all except the watchman turn in. And thus ends the miners' Sunday. In these vast forest wildernesses, a Sabbath so spent consecrates the whole week and brings a blessing on the camp."

School Children Pray

A sad and terrible railroad accident occurred at Goshen, N. Y., some few weeks ago, by which three young men were suddenly taken away by death. While their remains were lying in the undertaker's rooms, the children in the Primary Department of the Goshen High School told their teacher about the fearful accident, and how sad it must be for the parents and brothers and sisters of these three young men.

When the young scholars were asked by their teacher what they could do towards helping the afflicted ones, they said they would like to offer up to God a prayer for his blessing to rest upon them. Of course, the teacher was willing, and study for the time being was suspended.

There, in that quiet school-room, each one of the little boys and girls offered up a simple earnest and heartfelt prayer to God, that he would remember the afflicted fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters, and comfort them in their distress, for Christ's sake. The teacher was very much affected by the simple and unaffected piety of her little flock. Such scenes are rare, but they prove to us that sympathy for the bereaved, and true faith and love are to be found in the pure and innocent hearts of children.

Acceptance of Christ's Kingship and Reverent Allegiance to him the First duty in Time and Importance

WHEN John Bunyan drew the picture of the man with the rake, so intent on the sticks and straws he was gathering, that he did not see the angel hovering above him and offering him a golden crown, he presented the view which all the Bible writers from the beginning to the end take of life. Men who are absorbed in worldly affairs and neglect their spiritual interests, miss the best things attainable. As we say of a young man who gives himself to dissipation, instead of devoting himself to the preparation for a career, he is sacrificing himself. He does himself a wrong. He misses the true perspective of life. In the larger view of life, which includes eternity, the error is infinitely more disastrous. A boy at school who gave his time exclusively to the playground and made no effort to study, would not be more foolish than the man who devotes all his time and thought and energy to the acquisition of wealth or power, paying no attention to his spiritual concerns. The man's business, like the boy's games, are right and useful in their place, but the supreme occupation should be the first consideration. School is a preparation for life, as life is a preparation for eternity. A great deal of ridicule is cast on what a great writer called "other-worldliness," but who that realized the true relations of time and eternity could fail to see that the other world on which we enter at death deserves our most earnest and intense concern?

The Bible nowhere calls for a withdrawal from business life. The monks and recluses, who shut themselves up in monasteries to give themselves up to meditation and prayer, had a false idea of the spirit of Christianity. In his High-Priestly prayer, Christ expressly said that he did not pray that God would take his followers out of the world, but that in the world they might be kept from the evil. The true problem for the Christian is to be in the world without being of it. That problem has often been solved. There are men who have been successful in the world's pursuits, while they were governed by Christian principles. In any crisis in which they were required to choose between their allegiance to Christ and their worldly interest, when the two were incompatible, unhesitatingly held fast to Christ. Such crises are sure to come, but they are not the common or normal course of life. The artisan is not hampered by being a follower of Christ. Indeed, his very profession of Christianity requires him to do conscientious work, and to be fair and honest in his service to his employer. The physician, the merchant, the judge and the statesman find nothing in Christ's teaching inconsistent with the efficient discharge of their duties. They are not called to any service as followers of Christ that incapacitates them for devotion to their worldly calling. The combination has been tried again and again and always has been found possible. All the qualities which are admirable in the worldly occupation, carefulness, industry, integrity are commended in the Christian's laws of life. In fact, Christianity is a religion for men of the world and it calls for no sacrifices, at least in our land, which hinder worldly advancement.

Christianity, however, does require of its adherents supreme allegiance. It is not satisfied with the second place. If a Christian finds that his social surroundings, his occupation, his civic relations are endangering his spiritual life, he must sever his connection with them, and cannot do so too promptly. His soul and his relation to God are of paramount importance, and no sacrifice is too great that is made on their account. The consul of a foreign government finds no difficulty in living in an American city. He obeys its national and municipal laws, but all the time his allegiance is due to his own government, and he will do nothing inconsistent with that.

If he were required to take some course inimical to his sovereign, he would refuse, even at the risk of unpopularity or expulsion. So the Christian is a representative of his King, and his allegiance to him is his first consideration.

Christ requires his kingdom to stand first in the order of time, as well as in the order of importance. It is essential that entrance into that kingdom be attained at the outset, no matter what other claims are pressing on the attention. It too often happens that the young man postpones consideration of Christ's kingdom till he is settled in life, or the middle-aged man until he has secured a competence. That is not the rule of Christ. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God," is his injunction. He admits the middle-aged and the old, but it is an unsatisfactory proceeding. Christ requires the service of the life, not the fag-end of an existence, the best years of which have been given to the world. Nothing should stand in the way of a settlement of allegiance. Given to Christ at the beginning of life, the future is protected from evil and the consummation is a joy and a delight. It purifies and elevates all our worldly relations, and transforms our commonest duties by making them part of our service to him. Thus, the Christian becomes a light to the world, the very candle of the Lord.

AUNT HETTY'S
CHRISTMAS STORY

hands were stiff with cold), when she said, regretfully, "I'm sorry I can't give you any supper, but—"

A strange thing happened then. The guest interrupted mother.

"No supper!" he said; "no supper! Can't give me any supper, when I haven't seen you in seventeen years? You haven't grown stingy since I went to Madagascar, have you? Oh, Jeanie," fixing his merry brown eyes on her in love and yearning, "I wouldn't have believed it of you. Oh, Jeanie!" and in another minute mother was sobbing on his breast.

"Oh, Paul," she cried, "Oh, Paul!" It was mother's only brother, for whom our little Paul had been named. Well, it seemed to us all as if we had almost reached heaven that night. "I heard about your scorched cornfield in Byrne," he said. "I met Jim Wakefield over there. I just reached there to-day, and I felt as if I must come right on for fear—" hesitating.

"For fear we were hungry," mother put in eagerly, "and we are." Uncle Paul's lips quivered, but he kept control of himself. He opened a great basket he had brought.

"Here's enough supper for all of us," he said, "I'm about starved for once. Let's eat all we want to to-night, for by early dawn there's a wagon load of provisions due from Byrne."

"Oh what a supper we had! It was wonderful to see what that big basket held. Uncle Paul had packed it himself at the hotel in Byrne, twenty miles distant. We had coffee for the first time in months. We had bread and butter, cold roast chicken, roast leg of lamb, and many other good things.

Then the little ones went to bed. For us older ones there was very little sleep; we were too full of indescribable joy. With the break of day came Christmas, and then came the load of provisions from Byrne.

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow," sang mother.

From roast turkey to mince pies there was everything one could desire.

Uncle Paul stayed with us for a month. Before he went away our house was completely furnished—we all had warm clothing and there was an abundance of good things on hand. Father's wallet was so full that he could hardly get the strap around it. Each and all of us had money. When Uncle Paul went away he said to mother:

"You have taught me a lesson, dear. I'm going to build."

"Build!" mother said, "What are you going to build?"

"A fence of trust around to-day!" he said.

With the spring came a monument for little Paul's grave. When it was in place, mother fell upon her knees. Clapping her hands, she looked up with eyes radiant in spite of tears. "Dear God," she said, "dear God!"

The next year prosperity dawned in western Kansas.

Artistic Monuments COST NO MORE in White Bronze THAN PLAIN ONES

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides, it is very expensive. White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred public monuments. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Over $40,000 worth of work sold to Christian Herald readers in the last few years.

on Imparted Strength

By MRS. M. BAXTER

AS all through the Old Testament, from the very time of the fall of man, the promise of the Messiah, the Son of God, was made to man; and the Father's pledge of the gift of his Son to redeem a lost world runs like a golden thread through the law of Moses, the Psalms, and the prophets; so the promise of the Spirit runs through the Gospels, the Lord Jesus seeking, again and again, to introduce the third person of the blessed Trinity. Already in the Old Testament, "the Spirit of Christ which was in them testified through the prophets the sufferings of Christ and the glories that should follow them" (1. Pet. 1: 2). To the Jew it was the glory of Christ's reign on earth, with their beloved Zion as "the joy of the whole earth" (Ps. 48: 2), their Messiah sitting on the throne of his father David (Luke 1: 3), the law going forth from Zion, and "the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (Isa. 2: 2, 3). But to the Church of God, what are the glories which come by the sufferings of Christ?

The glory of the Jews will be the kingdom of Christ on earth, through which they, as Abraham's seed, shall be made a blessing to all nations; the glory of the Church is that her members are composed of men and women who are a habitation of God through the Spirit (Eph. 2: 22), indwelt by God the Holy Ghost who makes them his temples. We are created, redeemed, born again, and sanctified, that we, the members, may be as our glorious Head, filled with God, manifesting God, expressing God to the creation. He was "God manifest in the flesh." We bear "about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life of Christ may be made manifest in our body" (II. Cor. 4: 10). And this is only possible as we receive the Spirit of God to possess us and use us for God.

The evangelist St. Luke, having written his Gospel, alludes to it in the commencement of the Acts of the Apostles as "the former treatise" (Acts 1: 1). "This," he said, "I made . . . concerning all that Jesus began both to do and to teach, until the day that he was received up." Jesus began. Who but the members of his body shall finish the work begun by the head? He devises the plan, his members execute it, but only as the Holy Spirit, who dwelt in him, dwells in them. Let us not forget that we are called to a life which is supernatural. We are called to be spiritual, while our nature is yet carnal; to be heavenly, while our nature is yet earthly; to be creatures of eternity while we are living in time; to live without sinning while we have a nature which is sinful. Well may we ask with Nicodemus, "How can these things be?" (John 3: 9).

The life of our beloved Lord is the answer. God sent his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh. He was as weak and powerless to do the will of God as any of us are. He said, "I can of mine own self do nothing" (John 5: 30), "but the Father which dwelleth in me, he doeth the works" (John 14: 10). By the Holy Spirit possessing his human nature the Father dwelt in him and found expression through him; he was the Man (John 14: 5), he was the Word of God, because he yielded himself unreservedly to carry out all the will of God. By the Holy Spirit, if we are yielded up to God as he was, Christ dwells in us to do the will of God. The Father lived in him and he held constant communion with his Father by the Spirit. Christ lives in us if we are unreservedly yielded up to him. As we commune with God, and moment by moment consent to God's will and way in everything, the Holy Spirit forms Christ in us, and God can find through us expression of himself. Do we then perceive the immense significance, the unspeakable worth of that promise of the Father which the death of Christ purchased for us, and which comes to us by faith?

The last charge of the risen Lord to his disciples concerned this great gift of God: "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high" (Luke 24: 49). Up to this time the disciples had seen the holy life of their Lord, but they had no power to live such a life; they had heard and valued his teaching, but it was a thing outside of themselves; their own self-life gave the lie to all the divine ideal which they saw in him and heard from him. They would, but they could not; they were men under the law like the case described in Rom. 7. When they would do good, evil was present with them, and they did what they hated to do; they delighted in the law of God after the inward man. But why then this strife—which of them should be the greatest? Why this utter want of understanding whenever Jesus spoke of his coming sufferings? The life of Christ was as yet a thing outside of themselves, "The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus" was not in them, because he was not in them by their being filled with the Spirit. And Jesus had tarried with them forty days as the risen One! He had breathed upon them that they might receive the Spirit. He had opened their understanding that they might understand the Scripture; and yet there was something wanting, and for this they must wait.

QUAINT PHILOSOPHY

In an Advertisement

When a man acts as he believes the Infinite within him would have him act, he draws power to himself from unseen sources; that power may be shown in many ways.

Things work smoother, plans carry out, people begin to say, "lucky;" "he's a winner;" "everything he touches succeeds," etc., etc.

Ever try it? If you ever do, you will agree that it is the greatest proposition on earth.

There is a marvelous potency behind the man who acts in a simple, straightforward way, as near as he knows, in accordance with the promptings of that invisible Deity within.

This should teach him that great and honorable work is ahead; Man at once the tool and a part of the master workman.

The tool must not be dulled and ruined by bad food, tobacco, whiskey, coffee, etc. You question including coffee among "bad habits." None of these habits are bad habits unless they weaken or lessen the clean cut power of the individual. If they do, quit them. If food and drink are not well selected, change. Put your machine in clean, first-class shape. It is the purpose of this article to suggest a way to keep the body well, so it can carry out the behest of the mind.

A sure and safe start in the right direction is to adopt Grape Nuts Food for every morning's breakfast. It is delicious, pre-digested, highly-nourishing, and will put one far along toward doing his best in life's work.

Follow this with abandonment of coffee, if it does not agree with you, and take in place of it, Postum Cereal Food Coffee, for its regenerating and vitalizing nourishment.

With a wise selection of food and drink, man can quickly place himself in shape where the marvelous Directing Power will use him for some good and worthy purpose.

Sense, just plain, common sense.

Pastor Jansson's Mission

Pleading for a Training School for Ministers in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark

IN Sweden, Norway and Denmark, for years past, very great difficulties have been experienced with regard to the education of ministers. Only the Baptist Church has a really good school. The other Protestant denominations outside the State church have no school buildings or dormitories for the poor student, no libraries, and no houses for the teachers. Usually the pastor of a church, or the editor of a Christian paper has been the teacher, around whom a few young men have gathered to be instructed, as a preparation for the ministerial calling.

It can, therefore, be readily understood that the young students, who in most cases come from the plough or the workshop, have to contend with unusual difficulties in securing the education they require for their lifework as ministers. To meet the present needs it would be necessary to build and support three schools, one in Norway, one in Denmark and one in Sweden, but this is absolutely impossible, owing to lack of means. For this reason it has been decided to unite all the forces connected with this work, and to have a union school.

At the request of representative Protestant churches in the three countries named, the Rev. K. A. Jansson has been appointed to visit the United States and enlist American support for this enterprise. The Union Seminary, which will be built at Gotthenburg, Sweden, will cost altogether $40,500. Of this, $13,500 has already been pledged by the churches interested, leaving $27,000 still to be secured. Since coming to the United States, Rev. Jansson has succeeded in enlisting the interest of friends, who have given $11,000 more.

This leaves a balance of $16,000 to be still provided before the projected work can be undertaken and carried through successfully. Rev. Mr. Jansson, who is strongly endorsed by Bishop Vincent and Bishop Walden, of the American M. E. Church, who commend the project most cordially to the support of Americans generally. It is believed that there are thousands who are interested in the advancement of Christ's kingdom, and who, when they learn of this opportunity, and understand the real need, will gladly aid such work. To these and to all God's people, Pastor Jansson makes appeal at this season of generous benevolences. He writes: "I trust they will listen to the call and come to our help quickly. Especially timely would it be to remember this cause now, and give a Christmas or New Year's gift for this much-needed school for the training of young ministers. God will reward the givers abundantly."

Contributions may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, and will be fully acknowledged.

We Would Give $50,000 in Cash

if the people of the United States could in some way be made to realize that the greatest offer that has ever been made in real estate, or probably ever will be made, is embodied in our proposition to sell a lot in New York City with all city improvements for $480—because if the situation were actually understood by every person in the country there would not be one single foot of property left twenty-four hours after this knowledge was brought to their attention.

We are selling lots for less than $500 which are intrinsically worth $20,000, if you will take into consideration the three elements which go to make up values in New York City outside of fashionable districts:—distance from the center, transportation facilities, rate of fare.

The difference is, the $20,000 lot had transportation to it several years ago, and now is surrounded with houses costing from $10,000 to $40,000 apiece, while our land, which has only now just secured this improvement and transportation, must wait till the people realize that these have been secured, and until the solidly built portions (now so comparatively close to us) have reached and enveloped us, and actually brought the values where they rightfully belong.

Illustrations: Lot on corner 146th Street and Third Avenue, New York City, worth in 1881 $1,500, sold in spring of 1901 for $70,000 to Henry Lewis Morris. His grandfather sold it for $155 in 1853.
Lot on 50th Street, opposite Central Park, sold in 1850 for $500, in 1901 brought a price that showed an increase of $500 every 90 days from 1850 to 1901. (Authority, Real Estate Editor New York Sun.)

Utica Ave. and Linden Boulevard, Rugby. Every improvement you see has been made within 6 months

This increase will be maintained as surely as New York is destined to grow.
As sure as equal transportation makes equal values, so surely will this lot be worth as much as the lot in upper Manhattan.

We can prove it if you come to New York. We will try to prove it if you will send us your name and address. Is it not worth your while? We don't ask anything of you, only a letter or a postal. If we were sure you were in good earnest we would far rather say, send us your name and we will send you tickets to New York. This you know is obviously impossible, but if you will let us put the matter before you we will in some way prove that our proposition is a sound one, if we have to bring you to New York to do it.

What we want is to have you know that we are honest, and that every statement we make is incontrovertible truth. Then we are absolutely certain that we can do business together.

We sell a lot on $6 per month payment. This carries a life insurance, a guaranteed increase of 20% in one year, a free trip to New York, all improvements, your money back if you want it. What more can we do. Now, will you send us your name?
